A STARTLING TEST.

Medical Student Drinks Himself Into Delirium.

A curious case came within the purview of the writer when a young medical student, an athlete, a mighty hunter, a successor of great promise, completely unstrung himself, with the exception of delirium tremens as an experiment. One evening we had been sitting around the social board and several of his associates had cautioned him that he was going altogether too far with copious draughts of the strongest sort of whisky.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am going to have delirium tremens, and it is a scientific experiment. I am determined to know the sensations of a man in that condition. Let some of my friends keep watch over me, if they will, for I feel that I am now on the verge. Already I have seen things that I know do not exist and at times I find it almost impossible to keep myself under control."

Within an hour the man was being held in bed by four strong companions, he was seeing snakes, rats and devils, was a raving maniac begging for protection from the imaginary forces that beset him and was only with the utmost force prevented from plunging through the window. The waste of experiment from the scientific point of view was that after the delirium passed and the self-immolated victim was in the hospital he could not remember his delirious siege.

Drugs will produce delirium quite as successfully as drink. I am told by a Pittsburg druggist that when a cocaine fiend who had been refused a supply he took a running leap through the plate glass window of the door. Another instance is that of the cocaine doper who climbed to the top of a trolley pole, snuffed his powder and climbed down again. The jails are crammed with victims of drugs and stimulants most of whom are in some condition of delirium when they are gathered in; and here it may be said that the discipline of the jails often results fatally for the victim for the reason that the drink or the drug is at once cut off and the reaction produces death. Friends of persons who happen to be dragged to station house or jail in this condition should either take means to give them reduced supply of the means of their undoing or take them to a sanitarium.

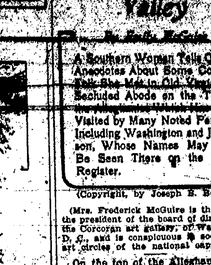
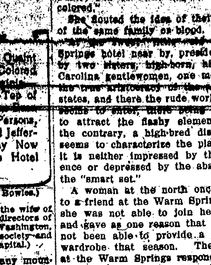
Plenty of life—but Home-like





The corn shocks stand upon the hills
Like smiles tenting in the fields—
The shifting harvest, full and ripe,
That rivals even Ceres' yields.
The hues of Autumn blends with red—
That clings upon the trailing grape;
The oak has put its color on
And wears its glory as a cape.

The grasses nod along the road
And billow in the lusty gale,
While everywhere the seal of fall
Is spreading fancies through the vale.
The crow sloft in noisy flight
Is sailing like a ship at sea—
A bold marauder of the sky
With blatant, raucous minstrelsy.

The crop is in and plenty smiles
Upon a husbandman made glad
The one who planted, tilled and reaped
Has won the prizes Nature had.
All vari-hued the Autumn comes
To charm us with her glowing ways
And lead us gently through the days
To chill and cold and winter days!

Chance Shots.

Last night I walked by the lake. There was a harvest moon and a mist. The moonlight fell across the tips of the tree-banks and silhouetted fairy cities into the water—and over the fairyland was the shimmer and the spell of silvery mist. No artist ever has painted a picture like that! Art is puerile compared to the imagery and the mastery of the Real Artist. One stand old married lady of the party said the scene was food for her soul, while another could find no words to express her thoughts as she stood eloquently silent upon the threshold of the picture world and let its beauty charm her into an ecstasy of delight. As for me, it reminded me of the beautiful sentiment of the pompadours, is a liberal education. A window's mourning, if, one happens to be there, is something fearful and wonderful to behold.

At a baptizing in the Jackson river on one occasion I saw and heard hundreds of the faithful singing and shouting:

"Now ev-ery one of you that thirst,
Step down into the water,
And free-ly drink and squench that thirst,
Like Zion's son and daughter."

At a recent wedding in the church at Shake-Rag—the preacher, who seemed to have heard rumors of the matrimonial snares and pitfalls of the outer world, made a charge to the contracting parties—a laundress and a waiter from the Warm Springs hotel—and concluded by saying: "And may you live together clever in the avoidable infidelity and may you never suppurate."

It is amusing, also, to see what rare combinations of Christian humanity and worldly pride one frequently encounters in that peaceful valley. I once attempted to adjust a difficulty which had arisen between two old female colored autocrats living in that mountain gap, and finally one of them said to me: "The trouble is in this here Gap that these niggers will speak mistruths which ain't outlines and make it hard for Sister Jane."

"Oh," said I, "if you are Jane's sister—"
