Smallest Treasury Deficit In Seven Years

THERE is information of great interest to the country in a statement issued by Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau on July 2 and generally buried in the financial sections of the metropolitan newspapers. He reported on the operations of the Federal Government for the fiscal year ended June 30.

Revenue receipts of six and one-quarter billion dollars were the largest for any year in the country's history, with the sole exception of 1920, which included huge sums derived from liquidating war-time assets. Total receipts of six and one-quarter billions were almost three times those of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933, and more than three times those of the fiscal year 1932. Income taxes alone brought in 2,635 millions, a greater amount than in any year since 1921. That was before the Harding, Coolidge and Hoover administrations had time to start their wholesale refunds of corporation taxes.

Expenditures, according to the Treasury's books, were 300 millions less than for 1937. Omitting the various revolving funds from which recoverable loans are made, the actual expenditures for 1938 were reduced from those of 1937 by more than 700 million dollars.

The Treasury's books show a "net deficit" for the fiscal year of 1,459 million dollars, but included in the expenditures are (1) 169 millions on account of loans that are to be repaid; (2), 460 millions for such permanent assets as public buildings, highways, flood control and reclamation and (3) 1,849 millions for additional, mostly non-Federal public works undertaken to furnish employment.

Altogether the expenditures which represent investment, either in physical plant or recoverable assets, but not including added assets for national defense, exceeded the deficit on the Treasury's books by more than one billion dollars.

Not only is the deficit the smallest in seven years but in a true sense there was no deficit at all.

The Treasury's books are kept on a "receipts and expenditures" basis. If they were kept a "[illegible]" basis, its books, the [illegible] would show a high treasury surplus.

Let Them Try Their Wings

WE TALK about our children's lack of preparation for life's battles because they have not power to reason philosophically with serious questions. How are they to develop this power of preparedness to fly out in the world for themselves if they are never given any chance to try their wings by making the attempt while they are in the home nest? Not by a multitude of fence-like repressive regulations, but by a trained liberty, the boy or girl will be prepared for life.

A boy and girl cannot grow and develop normally and splendidly unless given rope and scope. We do too much arbitrary planning for them. This love of liberty, this literal leaping over the traces and rude snapping of apron strings is but a natural and inevitable part of the youth's development from childhood to manhood

Do not allow yourself to become stiff and rigidly unyielding in viewpoint where any of the vital desires of your children are concerned. Patient consideration of their views and rights is absolutely essential to their best development. Talk things over with your children and they will talk things over with you. Confidence arouses confidence.

Hughes – And Aviation

IT HAS taken aviation eleven years to retrace Colonel Lindbergh's epochal track across the sky. But aviation has not been going around in circles meanwhile; unless one counts the circles airplanes have made around the portly perimeter of this spinning planet since the Spirit of St. Louis landed at Le Bourget.

That Howard Hughes has more than halved Lindbergh's time is the most significant thing of all. It makes the New York-Paris air route an overnight reality. No other mode of modern transportation can boast of such breathless progress in so short a time. In the field of ocean travel, for instance, nearly a quarter of a century elapsed between the first record passage of the crack Cunarder Mauretania and the new record of the German liner Bremen. Even then, the improvement shaved off only a few hours from the five-day crossing. The proportionately greater strides being made by transoceanic flyers show that aviation is still only beginning to achieve its amazing potentialities whereas today marine engineering apparently has almost reached its limits in the development of practical speed for surface ships.

Howard Hughes' flight may not serve any important aeronautical purpose. But it cannot fail to impress people with the inviting possibilities of long-distance air travel—possibilities which several nations already are preparing to develop with the inauguration of different types of flying services over different transatlantic routes within a few weeks.

Aviation has progressed in more ways than one in the past decade. The Hughes plane's radio equipment weighs a ton-and-a-half. This is more than half the total weight of the plane Colonel Lindbergh flew to Paris. Much has been made of the fact that aviation has halved the time for the Atlantic crossing within the last eleven years. But the progress in radio communication is proportionately many times greater. Progress does not run in grooves. And the Hughes flight only shows in how many different ways men are winning out in their conquest of time and space.—Christian Science Monitor.

The Outlook for War

THAT able student of public affairs, Mr. Walter Lippman, has been making an on the scene survey of the European war situation. He gives it as his opinion that the danger of a general European war has passed, at least for the near future. He points out that France and Great Britain have prepared themselves in the past year or two for a stubborn defense against aggressions from Germany. And he makes another interesting point, which is that the lessons of the warfare in Abyssinia, in Spain and in China have made military men revise their former belief that a surprise attack by airplanes and motorized troops is found to be successful against the best organized defense.

Unless Germany can win by a knockout blow in a single season of campaigning, her hopes of winning is gone, says Mr. Lippmann. In a long drawn out conflict the advantage is still with the defensive. "The terrifying of modern weapons causes the defenders to feel that they can expect no mercy, and that there is no alternative but to fight to the death."

In a long defensive war Germany, even with Italy fighting on her side, would be at a disadvantage. The resources of practically the whole world would be mobilized against the aggressors. So Mr. Lippmann comes to the conclusion that the Hitler government will not precipitate a war unless and until it can, by peaceful means, gain control of the Danube Valley and so have free access to the resources of oil, minerals and food supplies of that region.

A good way to round out a career is to be on the square.

HOW, WHAT AND WHY?

Special to the Andover News

The Andover News has arranged with the Office of Information of the New York State Colleges of Agriculture and Home Economics to answer questions about problems of farm and home. If you enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope and mention the name of this paper, you will receive a direct reply to your query from the colleges. Do not ask more than one question in one letter or on one postcard. Ask as many questions as you like, but make each one a separate communication.

Cause of Milk Drop?

H. B. inquires if hot weather and flies are a cause of drops in milk production. "Are fly sprays helpful?"

Professor K. L. Turk of the animal husbandry department answers: "Drops in milk production are common in July and August, and generally these drops are attributed to the flies and hot weather.

"In reality, they are probably due to a shortage of feed. Pastures dry up and proper supplemental feed is not supplied. Since the hot, dry weather and poor pastures occur at the same time as the flies, the flies get the blame. Carefully controlled experiments have shown that the actual loss in milk production by flies is small.

"While the use of a fly spray has good effects in repelling the flies for an hour or so and in keeping the cows quiet during milking, there is little evidence to show that any of the sprays are efficient in killing flies. The use of a fly spray will not maintain milk production when more feed is the real need.

"The use of a fly spray before milking as a temporary relief from annoyance may be justified. A fly spray should not be used that [illegible] on a petroleum oil base.

Bloom at Christmas

J. S. writes: "I purchased some poinsettia plants recently and want to know how to care for them. What kind of soil is needed? They are tender and of the indoor type. I want to have them bloom at Christmas time."

Professor [illegible] of the horticulture department replies: "Fine specimens should be grown in soil made of one half good garden loam, one fourth leaf mold, or well rotted manure and one fourth sand.

"They should be grown in full sunlight either outdoors or under glass, and should be given a temperature of 60 degrees at night during the fall and early winter.

"Flowering will normally occur at Christmas time if the room temperature is not above 65 degrees at night and if the plants are grown where they receive full sunlight during the fall and winter."

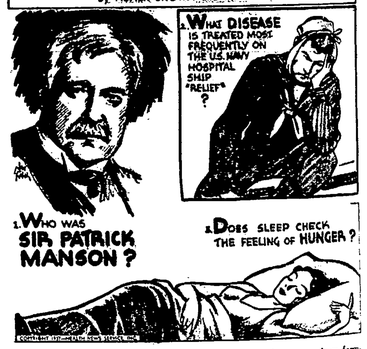
What Do You Know About Health?

By FISHER BROWN and NAT FALK



Answers: 1. The "Father of Tropical Medicine." His appointment as medical officer in Formosa in 1866 started him upon an energetic career in tropical surgery, and led to his many important observations of tropical diseases. Subsequently, he made London a great center of tropical medicine. He was the founder of the London School of Hygiene & Tropical Medicine.

2. Mumps. It occurs most frequently because so many of the boys who join the Navy come from farming districts where they have not been exposed to the common contagious diseases and so have not built up a natural immunity.

3. No. Sleep does not check the hunger contractions of the stomach. As a matter of fact, a feeling of hunger may interfere with sleep and cause restlessness. A snack before retiring, such as a cup of warm milk, is helpful if one is, or is likely to be, hungry.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT

He Slept With Each Leg of His Bed in Salt to Keep Evil Spirits Away

How would you like to have someone hand you forty million dollars? Well, that is precisely what happened to young Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt on his 21st birthday.

Strange as it seems, this young man, who was heir to one of the largest fortunes in America, has never gone to college.

He doesn't give two whoops for Society; but, like all the Vanderbilts, he is intensely interested in horse racing, and he inherited one of the most valuable racing stables in America.

His father, Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt, Sr., went down on the Lusitania when it was torpedoed by a German submarine during the war. Altho he was a noted sportsman, he was unable to swim. As the Lusitania was sinking, he was given a place in one of the lifeboats; but after he had taken his seat, he got out and gave his place to a woman. Shortly afterwards, another hysterical woman ran around the deck, tearing her hair and screaming that she had no life-belt. So Vanderbilt took off his life-belt and gave it to her.

A few minutes later the ship went down; and Vanderbilt died like the true sportsman and gentleman that he was.

The Vanderbilt fortune was founded by old Cornelius Vanderbilt. What a funny codger he was! He still is a bronze statue of him on the corner of the Grand Central Station, on Forty-second Street, New York.

Famous as a race in Staten Island, about 100 years ago, he horsewhipped his mother, on his 16th birthday, for her to run a small ferry boat and started carrying passengers from Staten Island to New York.

How much do you suppose he made out of that hundred dollars? One hundred millions! That is all. How did he do it? Largely by investing in ships and railways.

When he was first married and struggling to get a start, his wife ran a hotel in New Brunswick, New Jersey; and, in her spare time, she raised a family of eleven children.

When old Cornelius got rich, he wanted to move to the city, but his wife was an old-fashioned, home-loving person; and she objected. They quarreled, and he told her she was crazy; and in order to prove it, he had her shut up in an insane asylum for a year.

The old man had a lot of eccentricities. He never used a check book. He always wrote his checks on half-sheets of ordinary writing paper. And he hadn't the slightest respect for the opinions of others. Even when he was 84 years old and prostrate on his death bed, old Cornelius Vanderbilt refused to be bossed. When the nurses and doctors tried to make him do things, he threw hot water bottles at them, newspaper reporters swarmed about the house waiting for news of his death. That made him angry; and one day, when one of the reporters rang the door bell, he crawled out of bed, dragged himself to the head of the stairs and shouted: "I hain't dead and I hain't goin' to die."

With his vast wealth he was one of the most powerful men in America. He was afraid of no one yet he had each leg of his bed set in a dish with salt, to keep the evil spirits from attacking him while he slept.

TRUE STORIES OF HITCH HIKERS

by L. ELLIS EVONS

The Girl Got A Ride

A big man, middle-aged, had a breakdown quite a ways from a garage or service station and as I gave him a lift to get a mechanic, he told me of a funny experience, with an uninvited rider.

"I am no spring chicken," he said, "but you never know when you run up against something new. I have been around some and thought I knew lots of tricks, but I had an experience that was a new one on me."

I waited for him to continue. In my travels, and I travel over 25,000 miles a year, the tales told me by the scores of people to whom I have given rides are certainly refreshing. It seems that I must have a nose for news. My riders seldom disappoint me. My companion went on with his story.

"One night after having attended a meeting, I stopped in a cafe for a glass of beer and a sandwich. A few tables away sat a young, attractive woman. Several times I saw her looking my way, but paid no particular attention. Finishing my lunch and paying the waiter, I thought nothing of it and walked out to get in my car and go home. It was warm weather, my car was the only one outside the cafe and I had not locked it. The windows were down. On the front seat sat the young woman.

"You have made a mistake," I said, "and have gotten in the wrong car." "Oh no," she replied, "get in daddy, and let us go some where." I did not want to make a scene, so got in the driver's seat, thinking up some excuse to have her get out. All to no avail. She wanted to go for a ride or any place I would take her. When I tried to insist she said, she would, if I gave her $10, otherwise she would muss her hair, tear her clothes, scream and make a scene that would wake up the neighborhood. Well this was a pretty pickle to be in. As a respectable business man, with a family and reputation to maintain, I had to do some fast thinking. It was getting late. There was no officer around and I was not known in that particular section of the city. At last I had an idea, which I proceeded to put in operation.

"My business was located in another part of the city and I was well known to the police in that section, in fact, I had just finished a contract on a district police station there. 'All right,' I said to the girl, 'let's go.'

"It was quite a little distance, but any place was all right by her she said, while I hoped that the sergeant I knew would be on duty. I did not wish the misguided girl any trouble. Whether she was a novice or an old hand at the game I did not know, nor was there time to find out. I drove my car right into the court yard of the police station.

"Now," I said, "if you want to scream, tear your clothes and muss your hair, go ahead. I am going inside and have a policeman look you over. Before I do that, however, I will give you a chance. What do you say? With that she let out a string of bad language that would have done credit to a sailor, opened the door of the car and beat it down the street as fast as she could go. Whoo, what a tarter, I said to myself. Took a deep breath and headed for home."

Now my readers know why I do not pick up the fair sex. It worked out all right for Clark Gable and Claudette Colbert, but that was a movie—"It Happened One Night"—and I am not a moving picture magnate.
