Rely on Yourself.

All things come to him who hustles while he waits. Don't sit down with folded hands or stand with arm akimbo set until the occasion tells you what to do; don't wait for something to turn up or somebody to come along and take you by the hand to lead you up without any labor on your part, to the heights others have gained by push and perseverance.

TOOK THEIR MATES ON TRIAL.

One-Year Marriages Once a Common Thing in Scotland.

They who talk glibly of short-term marriages and affinities do not know that in Scotland a one-year marriage, termed a handfasting, was once legal and fairly common. It was abandoned on account of its injustice to the woman.

Scott, in "The Monastery," mentions this one-year marriage, making Sir Julian Avenal say:

"We take our wives, like our horses, upon trial. When we are handfasted, as we term it, we are man and wife for a year and a day; that space gone by, each may choose another mate, or at their pleasure, may call the priest to marry them for life."

There was no disgrace attached to handfasting. It was, indeed, more often practiced among the great than the lowly. But the poor girl whose trial husband rejected her at the year's end rarely found it possible to secure a permanent mate.

Smoking Meats.

For smoking meat I use an old heating stove that has a ton or drum on it, writes farmer in Journal of Agriculture. In the bottom I put the coals and green chips and hang the meat in the drum above. This is better than barrels because there is not so much danger from fire.

Pastures for Hogs.

One of the advantages of the pastures for pigs is, that they will fill their stomachs on the palatable green stuff, and besides its other qualities it distends the stomach in the development and make them larger for finishing with corn later on.

BUSINESS AND POLITICS

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE ANNUAL DINNER OF THE COMMERCIAL CLUB OF KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

(By Nicholas Murray Butler.)

The noise and clamor of the presidential campaign have now died away, and it is possible to discuss seriously and calmly some of the larger questions which confront the American people. It is most appropriate that these questions should receive the consideration of so representative a body as this.

It is an unfortunate characteristic of democratic government, particularly in a country so large and with such varied interests as our own, that when we are engaged in choosing our executives and our legislators, we must strike a balance between principle and policy, and must choose the course that we as individuals will follow in the midst of a myriad of minor, conflicting and distracting considerations. What stands out as the chief issue of a given political contest in the mind of one American, seems to his fellow a quite subordinate matter. One man will vote for the candidate of his choice because of his personality, although disliking his policies; another will vote for the same candidate because of his policies, though disliking his personality, still another will vote for the same candidate without regard to his personality because some one policy which he advocates or some one incident in his career makes strong appeal for support. Therefore, it is that we can rarely be quite sure that any given issue has been settled by a particular election. Our recourse must be had, when no election is pending and when there are no distracting surroundings, to that enlightened public opinion, to whose bar all political parties must be brought for judgment, and from which all political movements that are to be permanent must take their origin.

This government was founded by men whose minds were fixed upon the problems involved in the creation of political institutions. They were thinking of liberty, of representative government, of protection against tyranny, and spoliation, and of ways and means by which public opinion might, in orderly fashion, express itself in statute law, in judicial judgments, and in executive acts. The task of the founders was a political task, and with what almost superhuman wisdom foresight and skill they accomplished it, is recorded history.

The government erected by the Constitution was not at once or easily adjusted to the needs and desires of all the people. Not only were the judicial genius of Marshall and the irrefutable eloquence of Webster needed to build the nation upon the broad foundations that the Constitution had laid, but the moral problem presented by the existance of human slavery had to be solved. The lapse of many years, the sincere efforts of a score of constructive statesmen, and the blood of millions of Americans alone solved that problem.

After nearly a century of existance, the nation emerged from its long period of development and inward struggle to find itself a splendid legal and political unit ready to face the new problems which an expanding territory, a multiplying population and the lightning-like spread of invention, science, commerce and industry forced upon it.

So it has come to pass that we are no longer confronted primarily with questions of governmental form and political institutions. The place of our executives, of our courts, and of our legislatures, both state and national, are fixed with reasonable definiteness and well understood by the people. Such changes and readjustments between them as the future may have in store will come in all likelihood by process of ordinary development, and not through revolution or cataclysm.

Instead of questions involving the civil and political rights of the individual, and the mode of carrying on a representative government, we are now confronted by questions which are at bottom not political in the narrow sense, but economic. These are the questions which our political theo-

UNIQUE ENTERTAINMENT.

Willard Gorton Coming to Andover Next Tuesday Evening, Jan. 19, in the Interest of the Local Firemen.

The name of Willard Gorton is familiar to thousands of patrons of the first class, for he has appeared in nearly every state and territory in the Union.

Proclaimed at the very outset of his career as an artist of exceptional promise, his work now possesses that peculiar finish which comes only of ripe intelligence, wide experience and a delicate appreciation of possibilities. With that fine artistic conscience which never permits its owner to rest upon laurels won, his increasing endeavor to further perfect that which has already been many times pronounced perfect, makes his every performance vibrant with a freshness and vitality which can only be likene to perenial youth.

What does he do in an evening? He gives several delightful character studies in costume; a series of remarkable impersonations of noted men of the nineteenth century—Lincoln, Roosevelt, Gough, Conwell, Hughes, Twain, Crane, etc., etc.; several characteristic recitations ranging from touching pathos to hilarious humor; he tells a number of quaint original stories, and concludes the evening with his fascinating clay modeling.

Mr. Gorton has been in several nearby towns, which speak very loudly in his praise. He comes to Andover next Tuesday evening for Citizens' Hose Company, and should be given a large house.

Admission 25c. Reserved seats 35c. Seat sale at Calhoun's, opens Saturday noon.

FARMERS' INSTITUTES.

Three Institutes Arranged for in Allegany County this Winter, at Angelica, Black Creek and Whitesville.

Governor Hughes, in his annual message, spoke of the great benefits of the Farmers' Institutes to the farmers of the state, and that it brings to the producer the knowledge of which he may make immediate use. That the farmers realize this fact, is emphasized by the crowded halls and the intense interest manifested in the subjects discussed at the series of institutes now being held under the direction of the State Department of Agriculture.

The "Question Box" has always been considered one of the most effective means of disseminating information which will apply to the individual conditions of the questioner, and during a recent meeting in Chautauqua County, 104 questions were placed in the box. All reports from conductors and local correspondents indicate that before the close of the institute season, New York will have made a record in attendance never before equaled in the history of the work.

The speakers are selected and each program arranged with the idea of adapting the work to the particular locality in which the institute is held. In order that the greatest good may be accomplished for the money expended.

Institutes will be held this Winter in Allegany County at Angelica, Black Creek and Whitesville.
