BUILDING OF BRIDGES.

Utility Should Go Hand in Hand With Beauty in Public Structures.

In the designing and building of bridges art and utility should go hand in hand, more especially if they are public structures used and viewed by great numbers of people each day in the year. A large bridge may be made just as beautiful or as unbeautiful as may city halls, courthouses and other prominent public edifices. With all the possibilities in this direction, bridges of the present often appear a combination of strength and ugliness. In the making of the city or town beautiful an art commission is needed that will not only watch over the designing and construction of city hall and library, but pay equal attention to city and town bridges.

It often occurs that a public bridge provides an advantageous viewpoint where great natural beauty may be presented in a more impressive outlook than is possible from any other position. In such places man has no moral right to mar the landscape with hideous examples of his handiwork.

Removing a Blot.

"Mister," inquired the tramp, "would youse contribute a dollar to help beautify your town?"

"What's the idea?"

"For a dollar I'll move on to de next town."—Washington Herald.

TAFT ESCAPES BAD TUMBLE.

Weight of the President Too Heavy For His Executive Chair.

Under the weight of President Taft's 240 pounds, more or less, plus cares of state which have been pressing upon him more heavily than usual since March 4, the presidential chair, the big oaken swivel chair behind his mahogany topped desk in the executive office at Washington, gave way the other day, and the president extracted himself from the wreckage just in time to save himself from a bad tumble.

He was not hurt nor gravely shocked, for, if the truth be told, Mr. Taft is not unaccustomed to such accidents. Chairs in general are not built in contemplation of carrying so much weight, and he has at sundry times had sad experiences with them.

ONLY 97 MILES FROM POLE.

Captain Scott Explains Lieutenant Shackleton's Antarctic Record.

Captain Robert F. Scott, who commanded the British national antarctic expedition of 1900-4, writes that the really brilliant part of Lieutenant Ernest H. Shackleton's trip toward the south pole was apparently accomplished by the men themselves dragging their loads. Their ponies, like the dogs of the national expedition, only helped part of the journey.

Captain Scott points out that the usual record of antarctic distances is in geographical, not statute, miles; hence for purposes of comparison Lieutenant Shackleton's farthest south should be 97 instead of 111 miles from the pole.

Hobos Want a Newspaper.

Plans are under way at St. Louis by officers of the Brotherhood Welfare association, a "hobo" organization of which James Eads How, the millionaire tramp, is the moving spirit, for a big newspaper to serve as the official mouthpiece of the order, which is a socialistic body. A St. Louis capitalist has been approached on the subject of financing the enterprise, and, according to Mrs. Cora Harvey, secretary of the association, the outlook is favorable.

Time to Teaching It.

We tend to the city or town beautiful can in any way be made more effective than the one which lands through the public schools, for which reason all possible encouragement should be given to the teaching of horticulture during the early years of the pupils' attendance. We need, first, books on the subject for every grade in the common schools. Civic associations should take some concerted action in urging forward this work and could even provide leaflets calculated to interest and instruct old and young alike. These could be distributed to teachers and such others as applied for them, and in time all would become so interested that the demand for text books on the subject would make compliance necessary.

At present we have school gardens, nature study, elementary horticulture and other phases of the work in isolated cases where the teachers are somewhat interested or where some civic body has forwarded the work. What we now need is a standardization of the work through co-operation of all interested and the issuance of some printed matter bearing the stamp of approval of those in authority. With the aid of some simple leaflets, supplemented by a few seeds and living plants, we may soon have growing up a generation of lovers of the beautiful in nature that will transform our present unattractive and wholly artificial cities and towns into gardens of entrancing beauty. Soon after the institution of the preliminary work herein suggested there would follow a general and widespread demand for more literature, for more school gardens, for more plants in and about the schools and homes; more trips afield would be taken, a closer association with nature would result in the extensive planting of tree, shrub and vine in both public and private places, and ere long the city and town beautiful would come almost unconsciously, whereby all would be more happy, healthful and longer lived.—Los Angeles Times.
