KANSAS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARDEE, KANSAS, July 30, 1869.

One month ago the farmers here were in despair, thinking that their hard labor of this spring would be nearly all in vain.

Some of them had planted from 75 to 100 acres of corn three times over, and not one stalk could be found, and where a few weeks before was seen fields verdant with spring wheat, then had the appearance of being swept over by one of our magnificent prairie fires.

A small quantity of winter wheat, oats and potatoes was all the most sanguine were depending upon.

There was not a garden to be seen. Now this was a sad state of affairs indeed, which none know how to deplore as well as the settlers of a new country.

Some of the farmers came here last fall and invested their all in land, with few improvements and farming interests, and were depending for the future on what their farms would bring them.

All the suffering that was anticipated a few weeks ago was caused by the grasshopper. They came here last August in great numbers, doing but little damage except to gardens, which they entirely destroyed.

Last fall they deposited their eggs in the ground; the eggs are about the size of a rice grain, and thousands could be counted on one foot of ground.

The old ones died as soon as cold weather came; their eggs commenced hatching last April, and in one hour after leaving their tiny homes they commence their work of destruction.

At first they work slow for they are very small, not larger than a flea and perfectly white. They change color three times before their wings appear; they are then larger than the grasshopper.

They go in large swarms, and will enter a corn or wheat and eat every blade as they go.

They commenced leaving here about the 20th of June, and in ten days not one could be found, and as they took a northeast course perhaps New York will receive a call from them. They are a native of the West, but have never visited Kansas but once before.

They leave as soon as they get wings. The farmers were not idle while the grasshoppers were at work, for as soon as their corn was eaten down they would replant.

About the time the "hopper plague" left there came a three weeks rain. Then came a contest between corn and weeds for the mastery of the field; corn gained the victory and now looks well for the time it has been planted, and there will be corn raised yet if the fall is favorable.

The winter wheat in some localities is looking well, but there is not one hundred acres of spring wheat left in this county from the ravages of the hopper.

There was never a finer crop of oats raised; they yielded from sixty to seventy bushels to the acre, some of them are now being marketed. Potatoes look well. There are but few peaches.

The apple trees are loaded down with fine looking fruit. There is an abundance of wild grapes and plums; the frame grapes were damaged to some extent by the grasshoppers.

We have not been damaged here as much by rain as they have in some of the adjoining counties. In some places there were whole farms covered with water; in the southern part of the State there is not a bridge left. If this is the kind of rain that fall on "dry Kansas," I do not know what they do in a rainy climate.

The settlers in the southern part of the State and on the "neutral lands," do not, apparently, think much about the flood, for they are still endeavoring to keep Mr. Joy from getting possession of their lands or running the rail road through their counties.

On the 24th inst the "Leaguers" attacked the engineers and made them leave that part of the country.

The sheriff of Crawford county arrested some of the leaders, but it appears that they are not yet dangerous, for on the 24th inst the hands and the working man, Cato, were arrested by a party of about thirty leaguers, who notified them that they had come to burn them out, which they at once proceeded to do. They piled everything they could find in the way of tools, wheelbarrows, &c., and burned them with the tents of the hands. They then ordered the laborers back to Fort Scott, where they arrived the next morning.

Yours, HARRY.
