Blasphemy.

Blessing and hence are so closely coupled in all matters pertaining to the good things of life, that we need not wonder that many ill flow out of every abuse of the great gift of speech. Talk is as spontaneous as breathing, as we have said, but it is far from being always as inoffensive. White-handed Brivilliers poisoned a few people who were soon out of their misery, and she has been for ages held up to execration. Have we never seen a woman who has poisoned twice as many, for life and death, and who yet passes for a good sort of person? "apt to speak her mind, but meaning no harm"—with so little appearance of premeditation of evil intent do her cruellest stabs come. She does not report what she has heard—or she has it from good authority—or she did not say more than others said! In the course of a morning visit, she will shower a whole street of her "friends" like a bunch of kibitzes, and all peppered for the most fastidious palate. And it must not be thought that woman are the only sinners in this regard. There are men, too, who, without the excuse of insanity or idleness, take a dreadful pleasure in stripping from their competitors the garb in which they appear to the world, and this under a pretence of love of truth and justice! These disinterested champions of truth and justice are the last men to lay bare their own conscious secret faults to the public eye for the public good. Let us pray that the thing upon which we value ourselves most may never be mentioned in their hearing! Be it wit or wealth, beauty or good humor, humanity, steadfastness, sincerity or delicacy; pre-eminence in fashion or in learning, success in literature, patience in sorrow, honest effort in adversity, or what not, though it be the immediate jewel to our souls, no card house was ever demolished with greater coolness than will this voracious wing or turret of our character by the cool breath of the habitual detractor. He "speaks daggers, and every other word stabs."
