CHRISTMAS

It is fitting that kindly thoughts flow out to all today, Christmas Day; that it finds expression in gifts, good wishes and glad greetings. They are akin in heart who follow the leading of Bethlehem's Star. May the joy bells of Christmas "peace and good will" ring in all the homes of News readers, and the homes of all the people, and may the brightness of His presence illumine every heart, while we pour out at His feet our offering of grateful praise for the blessings His birth has brought us.

A gift, to be perfect, when given to persons of mature years, must sink itself in its symbolism. That is, the emphasis must be laid both by the giver and receiver, not upon what it is, but upon what it expresses. It is the feeling of esteem, of respect, of affection, of sympathy, of approbation, seeking an outlet through the gift, that makes, or ought to make, its real preciousness. This it is which throws a halo around the simplest token and sometimes makes a violet or a curl more truly valuable and treasured than the heaviest gold or the rarest gem.

The spirit of Christmas! What is the spirit of Christmas? Is it the generous spirit, the spirit of giving? Yes, but that is not all. There will be millions of gifts made between now and the new year, and they will not all express the Christmas spirit. Some will be made out of pockets of plenty and thus entail no personal service; some will be made under compulsion of supposed necessity. How many people give things at this time because they think they must. They must give to those who, they hope or fear will give to them. It is almost unfortunate that giving and taking has become such a feature of our Christmas celebration because the mere gift is uncapable of expressing the spirit of this occasion and the occasion itself has become a burden to many hearts. It has been so much abused. It is not by giving [illegible] we honor Christ whose birth [illegible] brute force [illegible] by every good thing [illegible] This plus the [illegible] Christmas [illegible]

"Advertising is friendly. It persuades. Slowly but inevitably it creates the attitude of good-will and confidence. It brings customers—who stay. A business built up in this way is built on a firm foundation. It's the kind of success that lasts. But it can not be done in a day—or a month. Nothing but persistent advertising will accomplish this sort of success."—Cuba Patriot.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS CLOSED

After a three weeks religious campaign the evangelistic meetings closed last Sunday night in the Methodist Episcopal church with a big crowd present, and a strong appeal by the evangelist on "The Harvest Time." Considering the bad weather and outside attractions and preparation for Christmas the meetings have been very well attended. There are probably some people in Andover who do not go to church because they are bad, but there are more persons in whom there is developed no religious sentiment, nothing to which a religious service appeals, just as there are persons with little artistic or musical appreciation. I say furthermore that the average sermon to-day is of a higher quality than ever before, and no other body of men on the face of the earth who appear to speak to their fellow men can compare with the preachers and evangelists of the world for learning, eloquence.

The committee wish to express culture, character, kindly and their gratitude to all who supported the meetings by their attendance and means, also to the members of the federated choir who helped on the good work by their singing, and to the various churches who opened their doors for the evangelistic services.

All the incidental expenses were met by collections, and a substantial free-will offering given to Evangelist Davidson for the faithful earnest work he did during his three weeks campaign in our town. Mr. Davidson left a good impression in Andover and the best wishes and good will of the church people will go with him to his next field of labor at Oriskeny, N. Y., and from there to Pittsburg, Pa.

WRECK AT BIRDSALL

Dec. 20.—A double headed freight, pulled by the 207 going north, hit a broken rail opposite the Birdsall station Saturday, at 3:30 p. m. The station was hit by the cars and pushed to one side and the French house was completely demolished. The crews from both engines escaped uninjured and Mr. Mapes, station agent of Birdsall, and a child who was in the station at the time, both got out in time to avoid being hit. The St. Mary's cracker was called and had the track cleared in a very few hours.

HIS GREAT REMORSE

By MARY LLOYD EVANS.

Always the footsteps behind me, dull, hollow, but echoing—never before. Did they but precede I might have had hope, for then they might guide me to some haven of rest, peace for my tired heart.

I was not a wicked man, nor a mean man, nor a disgraced man. I was only a murderer. So the world never that, but to my own conscience, yes. A thousand deaths were in my heart and one poor victory—if I could call it that.

"I consent to the marriage."

"Secret, of course?"

"It must be that way under the circumstances."

Burned into my brain were these three sentences, for they started the train of circumstances that resulted in a terrible tragedy.

It was six weeks since that I overheard Huldah Evans speak the first, Vane Telford made reply. Then her final words—"my love, my adored one!" She whom I worshiped was a party to a clandestine complication with a rival I had never feared, nor before that even suspected.

He had come to the village, a stranger. He had made several calls on Huldah. I was curious, but she never apprised me as to the personality of her new acquaintance nor his motive in visiting her. That vividly remembered afternoon I was lining a high hedge, surrounding the Evans place when I heard the brief colloquy noted. I had come to the spot with my heart full of hope and love. I left it vengeful, embittered, my soul immersed in the blackest despair.

I wandered towards the narrow but deep rolling stream at the edge of the town, my spirit dazed, my heart distracted. This, then, was the end of it all. She loved another! I flung myself on the grassy bank, watching the swift eddies just above the waterfall. It was an unfrequented spot for the present, for the old foot bridge had been condemned, as all the regular townsmen knew, a new structure being proposed, and the roadway on either side of the stream was blockaded some distance back. There signs were up, warning the approaching driver and pedestrian of peril.

I sat in a daze, staring blankly at the rushing waters, madly tempted to plunge beneath their surface and [illegible] the dim snore, calling madly the name of the man I had—murdered.

Only the sound of the waves, the roar of the falls below, the night bird's thrill answered me. The void had opened up and swallowed my rival. Huldah was free, but I—tramp! tramp! tramp! ever the accusing footsteps, and always behind me, pursuing, challenging, accusing!

Looking back now I marvel how I passed those dreadful days, those wakeful nights of the two weeks succeeding. Twice I had called upon Huldah. I was amazed at the fact that she betrayed no anxiety, none of the suspense of a bride expectant whose object of devotion had mysteriously disappeared. My guilt drove me to make my visits brief and constrained, although Huldah seemed glad to see me. She had with her now a cousin, a pale-faced, hopeless-eyed girl, who seemed an invalid, Martha Dawes.

No word of the fate of Telford had reached the newspapers. I had lined the river for miles, making cautious inquiries, but with no result. Then one evening those torturing footsteps drove me to a resolution: I would see Huldah once more, confess and leave the place forever.

It was twilight when I reached her home. She sat in a rustic chair in the garden humming a low tune. Miss Dawes, near by, was gazing with sad, far-away eyes at the crescent moon. I leaned over the chair and said to Huldah:

"I wish to tell you something of Vance Telford."

She started, glanced quickly at her guest, and, her finger on her lip, led me to a distance.

"What of Mr. Telford?" she challenged, with a certain sternness that chilled me.

"He is dead, and I—am his murderer!"

And then the words leaped over each other tumultuously as I told my story, all of it, without reservation.

She grasped a tree for support, her face a white void.

"Go away!" she faltered, waving her hand distractedly. "I must think—think!"

It was all over! She hated me, she despised me! I wandered about aimlessly, but the influence of fatality drew me to the river. Ever, it seemed, calling to me, for miles I trod its banks, the footsteps—tramp! tramp! tramp!—beating incessantly on my agonized ears.

I must have gone several miles, when I drew behind a bush near the shelving shore of the stream to avoid meeting a man, progressing slowly with the aid of a cane. I was in no mood for companionship. I moved too far, my foot slipped. I went headlong, and was conscious of my head striking the water and a rock at the same time. Then I was insensible.

My blood curdled as I regained consciousness, for I recognized that the man bending over me had dragged me to safety, and that man, in form and substance, Vance Telford!

Within an hour I knew all the story of his rescue down the stream, his convalescence, his begins now to the Evans home. And then I learned that it was the sad hearted Miss Dawes who loved him, and that Huldah had arranged for their clandestine marriage because her cousin could not live without him. Her [illegible] Telford, nor did Huldah let [illegible] was assured that Telford was to wed Miss Dawes secretly and then publicly and make a man of him, for he had been a sad [illegible]

Sign Boards on the Up-road

By Hamilton B. Williams

Brother David has been a long time gone from the gardens of this little world, but he walks still in the lanes of human hearts. In talking with him about the uproad he said:

He shall dwell in God's holy hill—who walks straight up and works righteous, who speaks truth in his heart, who slanders not, who does not evil to his friend, who takes not up a reproach against his neighbor, he that swears to his own hurt and changes not, he that puts not out his money to usury, nor takes reward against the innocent. And he shall ascend into the hill of the Lord who keeps his hands clean and his heart pure, who lifts not his soul to vanity (wind-stuff.)

And Soloman:

"To do justice and equity is more acceptable unto the Lord than sacrifice." The saying justifies his claim to wisdom.

But the sure signboards of guidance are the words of the Master:

At this season of the year when we celebrate the coming of the King of Life let us hear what He says to us who are strive ing up.

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so to them. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

My friends we have come up to the gates of another year with lamps still lighted. Let us mark out a bigger, broader life for the coming year than ever before. By stretching up and reaching out we find God.

And let us be good,
And courteous,
And kind,
And gentle,
And forgiving,
And long suffering,
And easily got at.
And faithful,
And sweet,
And blithe,
And joy-makers.

So shall we glorify the human streets and so shall we find the upper streets a-flutter with rejoicing when we turn again home.

CHRISTMAS TIME

Very early in the Christian era, not later than the middle of the Fourth century, the 25th day of December began to be celebrated as the day of Christ's nativity. Once established the custom rapidly gained ground until all over the Christian world, the day was greeted by the crowds thronging the churches, with enthusiastic songs of joy.

Through all the long centuries since, and amid all the changes they have wrought the Birth-Day of Christ has maintained its hold on the hearts of the people. It is a time of universal rejoicing. The kindly interchange of gifts which speak of love and tenderness brings constantly to mind God's great gift to the world. It is a time peculiarly adapted to the awakening of feelings of kindness and brotherly love, no time so fitting as this for the reconciliation of friends estranged; for the putting away of harsh and unkind thoughts. Amid the jarring discords of life we need such a day. Let us look carefully into our hearts and see if there may not be abundant reason to revise our harsh judgments and correct our false impressions of our fellows until the bitter springs of our natures be sweetened. We who need to be forgiven—how ready we ought to be to forgive! On this blessed Christmas time "let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

Health Questions Answered

PUBLIC HEALTH HINTS

Prepared Each Week For the Readers of This Newspaper by the New York State Department of Health.

THE editor of the Health Hints will always be glad to answer questions of general interest bearing on public health problems, addressed to the State Department of Health, Albany. Two such questions recently received are sufficiently important to be discussed in this column.

How Measles Is Spread.

A mother of the Health Hints in a small town writes: "We have had an epidemic of measles in the school here, and my little boy has just recovered with it. We have a good health officer, and he is very [illegible] [illegible] and my children are careful and I am sure I have never [illegible] sick. How could Johnny have got it? I can't think it can be the milk?"

REPLY.

[illegible] diseases which have never been traced to [illegible] that the little boy caught it [illegible] in the EARLY STAGE of [illegible] [illegible] is great [illegible] [illegible] anything else [illegible] is an overdose of measles germs [illegible] [illegible] another children [illegible] have an incubation period of fourteen days to develop [illegible] and before the first symptoms appear. [illegible] exposed to infection should be watched [illegible] and if they appear ill in any way at the end of that time at least be suspected of having measles. Above all things, Johnny's mother, brothers and sisters, if he has any, should be protected from [illegible] measles is often a VERY SERIOUS disease for very young children.

Danger from a Tuberculous Neighbor.

A correspondent from a city writes: "A family has just moved into the apartment next door, and there is a young man in the family who has consumption. [illegible] he is coughing all the time, and I am afraid that his children will catch it if they meet him in the hall. Isn't it wrong to let such people live among other people where they are a source of danger all the time?"

REPLY.

Whether a consumptive is a source of danger to family and neighbors depends entirely on how he takes care of himself. The germs of consumption are discharged from the mouth in the sputum and in the form of droplets in coughing. If a consumptive is careful to expectorate into a cup and not on the street and coughs in the face of everybody he meets he is a very REAL DANGER. Any person has the right in law to report such a careless consumptive in writing to the local health officer, and the health officer must investigate the case, and if he finds the case a dangerous one he can appear before a magistrate and have the consumptive committed to an institution.

If, on the other hand, a consumptive always uses a sputum cup and never coughs except in a paper napkin or handkerchief and never uses cups or spoons or other things used by others he need not be a source of danger to any one. Any such case as the one described would, of course, be better off himself in a sanatorium or hospital, where he could be taught how to build up his health and overcome the disease with which he is struggling.

OLEAN MAN ARRESTED AS A GERMAN SPY

Norman Chambers, formerly a resident of Olean and well known here, says the Times, was arrested as a German spy in Russia at a point a three days' journey north of Petrograd, about a month ago. Mr. Chambers is fair and in appearance much resembles the German type. He was taken at once before a tribunal at Petrograd and carefully questioned. He was able to prove his identity and was soon released.

ORIGIN OF CHRISTMAS TREE

The Christmas tree is supposed by great numbers of people to have originated in Germany, but from a reliable source we learn that the Christmas tree came in the first instance from Egypt, and its origin dates from a period much earlier than the Christian era. The palm tree is known to put forth a branch every month, and a spray of this tree with 12 shoots on it was used in Egypt at the time of the winter solstice as a symbol of the completed year.

WORK OF ANCIENT DENTISTS

Remarkable Teeth Decoration Shows That They Possessed Considerable Skill.

By far the most transcendent example of teeth decoration which has at present come to light in America is in a skull discovered in 1909 at a place called La Piedra, near the point on the right bank of the Esmeraldas river where it empties into San Mateo bay. It was accidentally found by Mr. Pinzon and Mr. George D. Hedian, the latter an American consular agent at Esmeraldas, and was kindly presented by Mr. Hedian for the Heye museum during my visit to Ecuador last summer. The skull was seen projecting from the bank, but no other parts of the skeleton were uncovered, probably having been washed away after the bank was undermined.

The upper part of the skull is in fragments, but is restorable. The skull, slightly deformed, is that of an adult female. The decoration of the teeth is unique and presents a new type of facial ornamentation. Instead of small disks being set into artificial cavities we find in this case that certain teeth of the upper jaw were almost entirely covered on the outer face by an overlay of gold. The entire enamel of the teeth decorated has been removed, with the exception of narrow bands at the bases and the upper parts, where they were close to the flesh and embedded in the jaw.

The removal of the enamel is through to the dentine and was skillfully accomplished. It appears that in some instances sawing was done slightly under the enamel, at the upper part, so that the gold overlay, or covering, might be fitted under it in order to make it more secure. The teeth thus practically "face-covered" are the four incisors and the two canines. The overlays are selective in all because of the teeth the left lateral incisor. This gold covering is always folded on best on each side of the tooth, [illegible]
