Song, "Just Before the Battle Mother." Society.

After the program the girls enjoyed a candy pull.

Following are some of the School Notes read by Miss Celia D. Riley:

The society is not rushing business very much this winter. Once it was thought that the members would dry up and blow away; after being fed on such light refreshments, but little Maude got her pill case and doctored up the weak patient.

Gertrude Osborne has been receiving catalogs lately telling how to mail a large "auto" in a snow bank.

Mary Ella Green has been on a strike for higher wages, but then she thinks type setting is quite a paying business.

Helena Bloss asked Pearl Potter if she got a valentine, and she received such a sharp answer that she thought she was cut with a razor, but then, such a close shave did the effect Helena as it would some other girls.

Can't blame Pearl, for she has to advertise her trade some way.

You can't get Jessie to swear, but she will say 'By Joe."

If Ella Mulcahy had not been a good runner, she might have had a chance to join a show troupe, which was here recently.

Cornelia O'Hargan has accepted a position as clerk in one of the drug stores. The society wishes her much success.

WHERE WAS A MAN SENT FROM GOD

LINCOLN MEMORIAL ADDRESS GIVEN BY REV. H. D. BACON BEFORE THE LOCAL G. A. R. AND WOMEN'S RELIEF CORPS.

"God hath brought down the might from their seats, and exalted them of low degree."—Luke 1: 52.

We are to consider this morning the life of a man who was sent from God just as truly as was John the Baptist. A man whose life was in itself one of the greatest miracles of the ages. A man who just as truly walked with God as did Enoch of old. Our first text is no violation of the rules of reverence or interpretation or of truthfulness, for there was a man sent from God whose name was Abraham Lincoln. One hundred years ago last Friday, in a humble home in Hardin county Kentucky, the man sent from God was born, and the name of no other American has been so highly honored on the one hundredth anniversary of his birth as her that of this man; and all of this notwithstanding the fact that his early life and history are well written in that one brief line from Gray's Elegy, "The short and simple annals of the poor." Humble though his birth, may have been, lowly though his early surroundings, still while men of princely birth and breeding have died their memory passed, ABRAHAM LINCOLN has, with the years since his untimely death, been raised to even a higher place in the hearts and minds of the American people.

Now God gives us great lessons in the lives of our great men, and in none are the lessons more clearly shown than in the life of this man in whose memory we meet today He's life was a gift not only to his own generation but to every generation The bluff and austere Stanton, who seemed to be so out of sympathy with Mr. Lincoln in many things, showed his own true heart, and spoke true words on that night when soon o'er all the land the night of mourning was to fall. Closing the eye lids of the murdered president, he tenderly whispered in the depths of his great grief, "Now he belongs to the ages." And the ages will claim him for their own. We of today, our fathers before us, and our childrens children yet unborn, all have had and will lay their tribute at the feet of this man; and thank God that though born of low degree, though reared in poverty, though a humble minded citizen still in the words of our second text, "God hath exalted him" so that every nation and every age shall see his greatness.

Indeed he was and is our first American. He was cast in a mould all his own, which has been broken and will never be recast. The case which held his large spirit has long been dust, but we of to day still reap the harvest of his large fruitful life.

And the exaltation of this man is the miracle of the century. Schooled in the wretched school of poverty; with the uncouth stamp of a rude ancestry upon his face and figure; ungainly in appearance; and with none of that breeding which marks the diplomat and statesman; yet this man won the highest honor to which any American citizen can possibly attain. No polish could rub off that which his ancestry and early surroundings had made him. He was in appearance always the same awkward, unpretending ungainly man. Style of dress and manner was never his. Soft speech with flattering words he could not use. Public functions made him ill at ease. At his own inaugural he dressed up embarrassing and ashamed. Soft raiment never sat well upon this man, for he was a home spun king. Providence had here raised from the most unlikely origin, six feet four inches of man every inch of it. Men with puny minds and veneered manners could sneer at his rural simplicity and awkwardness they could call him outlandish, as many of them did, but they could not stop the noble patient unselfish soul in its course, they could not stay the hand of God that guided him, they could not crush or kill the love of all true men for this, gentle plain just and resolute man. It was the forty third degree of popular confidence which gave him the noblest of all titles "Honest Abe." The nation could look to that towering six feet four of plain unpretending honesty and even with the tears of mourning in their eyes with sons and husbands lying dead before them they could sing: "Six hundred thousand loyal men, And true, have gone before. And we are coming Father Abraham, Three hundred thousand more."

No prince with his royal retinue, no politician with his pandering positions, no diplomat with his soft word and hidden motives: only an honest Abraham Lincoln could have won such a response as that from the pain wracked war tortured people. And this lyric which we just quoted, and which names him Father Abraham, is one of the moving lyrics of the ages, because the poetry of its song was more practical by the deeds of those who sung it. All because an honest man stood towering above the chaotic events of the day. Because his honest hand held the helm of the storm tossed ship of state.

This principle of honesty was one of the rich jewels of his inheritance He clung to it and guarded it with unwavering faithfulness.

He was an honest rail-splitter, clerk, lawyer, legislature, ruler. He could wash his hands of the dishonest law suit even though he lost money by it. He could say to a dishonest man making his help to sue a poor widow, "You must remember that some things that are legally right are not morally right. I shall not take your case but I will give you a little advise for which I will charge you nothing. You seem to be a sprightly energetic man. I would advise you to try making six hundred dollars in some other way." It was this unremitting unchanging honesty, which in every matter great and small prompted and guided his action and won for him such confidence as no other course could have won in such times of national stress and peril.

And so God exalted this man of low degree first because he was honest. He has exalted his memory in the mind of every true American citizen because he was honest. And however low may be the degree of birth, however humble may be the soil of early environment, however simple the life and manner, however awkward the face and figure; still "An honest man's the noblest work of God," and an honest man as did Abraham Lincoln, will win the confidence and esteem of his fellow men, the approval and exaltation of God and men.

And another mark of the great and good Lincoln was his humility. In his very appearance and bearing he showed that humility which was in his heart. A veteran of the civil war told me that he had one picture of Lincoln in his memory which he should never forget. He said he saw him riding with General McClellen once during the war. McClellen was the ideal soldier in appearance. He sat his horse like a king. Erect, shoulders squared, head up, he gave the impression of being a man who could lead and rule: and said the old veteran, it was hard to realize that the stooping, ungainly, humble and uncouth man riding beside him was the real ruler. When he returned from his New England speech making trip and was greeted as the republican candidate for president, he laughed at the idea and said, "What, I preference to Chase and Seward and those, distinguished representatives of the party."

A visitor in the line at one of the receptions at the White House said to him, "We have come a long ways to see the president." Mr. Lincoln smiled and said, "I wish we could show you a better one." Never self assentive, never arrogant, always considerate of his fellow men, humility was one of the sweetest clearest notes of his character and whole life. He never tried to hide his humble origin or lowly life. He never lost touch and sympathy with the masses and especially with his humble comrades of early days. Once an old acquaintance was seeking from him the appointment to an important and responsible position with the government. Mr. Lincoln said to Mr. Seward: "I don't believe I can recommend that man. I never was very much impressed with his ability when I knew him—" But then, "he added "I dont suppose he was with mine either, and here I am." This he said as he looked up at the room of the capitol in which he was standing and down at his own awkward form. Elected to a second term when no higher tribute could have been given to his own worth and nobility, he took it not so much as a tribute to himself as to the wisdom of the American people in not making a change in the administration at that time. He said, "I dont conclude that this means that I am the best man by any means but am reminded of the old farmer who remarked that it was not best to swap horses while crossing a stream When we know this simple unaffected humble life we remember the words of the man of Galilee, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted," and we must confess that never in a human life have Christ's words been more forcibly and beautifully illustrated, than in the humble true and unassuming life of Abraham Lincoln. These rare virtues were the very foundations of his character. He had a wonderful mind, he used it in a wonderful way. His Gettysburg speech is not only an oration, it is a classic. He was an orator who could rival any of his day, and is yet to be out rivaled by any American. His logic was unassailable and forcible, his wit and humor were unsurpassed, his wisdom and judgement in affairs of state were unrivaled and the years have attested to their soundness. As a lawyer he won fame, and well earned laurels before he was exalted to the leadership of the nation. But after all it was not these sterling qualities alone which won for him his lasting fame and a nations confidence: underneath all in all, through all, there shone the true light of honesty and humility and by these he won his place and fame in history, his place in the heart of America. The strength of an honest, God guided, humble character, shone in his honest homely face. That character in itself exalted his talent and ability to their true place. He was a God sent man, a God exalted man because with consecrated humble minded honesty he could serve this Nation in its great need as no other of his day could serve. No talented dishonest diplomacy, no cold hearted intellect, however great could have saved the Union. It needed an honest humble hearted Lincoln. Some men of recent years would be little his fame. A famous New York preacher said not many months ago that Lincoln if he lived today would not be equal to the place of the president. But how many men are there here today who would have been equal to his place back in the sixties? That was no time for big stick rule, but for the

"A TEXAS RANGER."

Representing a Conflict Between the Free Spirit of the West and the Conventionalities of the East.

No other drama so well reflects the manhood, the freedom, the honesty, and the indomitable spirit so characteristic of the people of our great country as does "A Texas Ranger" the attraction at the Auditorium Tuesday night March 2nd. The story of the play represents a conflict between the free untrammelled spirit of the West, and the traditions and conventionalities of the East. It tells the story of an eastern woman and a western man whose wooing was strange but most romantic. A Texas Ranger possesses literary qualities rare in plays of today that are satisfactory from an acting standpoint and the story is told in unctious, picturesque prose illuminated by a glowing and virile imagination. The cast for a Texas Ranger is far above the ordinary and is headed by Mr. Perry Akey, who for the past three years was the star in "Arizona." One of the many features of the show is the great parade of the "Cowboy Band" at noon.

Burned the Mortgages.

At a special service Sunday morning, the Universalist church of Whitesville witnessed the burning of the mortgages which had been incurred by the purchase of a parsonage and extensive repairs on the church edifice.

The tray containing the papers was held by two of the trustees, O. A. Potter and Ellis Day. Master Cecil Robasco, the little son of Dr. and Mrs. L. G. Robasco, lit the paper, which burned while the congregation united in sing
