The Farm.
Cider and Vinegar.
 The best use to make of inferior fruit is to convert it into vinegar.— Good cider can be made only from good fruit. Much of the stuff called "cider" is poor trash. If the apples are allowed to "sweat" in heaps for some time, they will lose a considerable amount of water and consequently yield a richer juice. It is better to put off cider making until the approach of cold weather, as then the fermentation goes on more gradually, and a better article is the result.

Planting Trees.
 Whenever fall planting is advisable, let it be done as soon as the trees can be had. If they have been ordered, plow and prepare the land, and place a stake to indicate the position of each tree. When they arrive, they can be put in without delay. Do not mix varieties, but put those of a kind in the same part of the orchard. The advantage of this will be seen when there is fruit to be gathered.

Labels are attached to the trees at the nursery and often are wired on so firmly that the bark is strangled.— Look to every label and see that no injury can result from this cause. The position of every tree should be recorded, so that when the labels become lost, as they will sooner or later, there will be no doubt about the identity of the trees.

Taking up Plants for Winter.
 Many of the hardy plants which have bloomed in the borders, such as Fuchsias, Carnations, Roses, Geraniums, etc., should now be prepared for their winter quarters and potted at once. These may be kept in a cold frame or pit or in a dry cellar. The succulent shoots should be cut away at the time of potting, and be exposed to air, but shaded until they become established. The longer they can be kept out without injury from frost, the better they will endure their winter confinement. Chrysanthemums for blooming in doors should now be potted.— They will wilt somewhat at first, but will soon recover, and give a satisfactory bloom. After the flowering is over, cut back the stems and place the pots in the cellar. Some of the Geraniums will bloom during the winter in the house if taken as early and well cut back at the time. Ivy for house growth will bear almost any treatment, but it is best to take it up at once and allow it to be well rooted in the pots before removing it to doors, and then take it to a cold room.

Keeping Winter Pears.
 No fruit is worse treated than the late autumn and winter pears. They are generally gathered before their time, and then kept in a dry atmosphere. What wonder is it that a fruit which should be melting and delicious, turns out to be shrivelled, tough, and tasteless thing! Most of the late varieties, large in size, should be allowed to remain until there is danger of hard frosts; they are to be carefully picked when dry, placed in boxes or barrels, and kept as cool as possible. It is not a good plan to take them to the cellar until the weather becomes so cold as to endanger their freezing. When in the cellar the temperature must be kept as low as possible, without danger of frost. Do not mix varieties in the same package. The different sorts have each their own time for maturing. A frequent examination will show how the process of ripening is going on, and the slower this progresses, the finer the fruit is likely to be. When the proper changes have taken place within the fruit, it is indicated by a change in the color of the skin. When this commences, the fruit may be taken in small quantities at a time to a warm room, to "finish off." We have seen even the "Winkfield" when treated in this manner, prove itself a most acceptable variety. —American Agriculturist.
