A New Impeachment.

We take the following from the Lawrence (Kansas) Daily Republican, Journal

It is rumored that charges of a most serious nature are to be preferred against Senator Pomeroy when the Senate convenes again. The general count will consists of two indictments: first, that the Senator used improper means to secure his re-election, and secondly, that he has prostituted his position to purposes of personel profit. Such charges, if preferred, will of course secure a committee of investigation, with power to send for persons and papers; and we would suggest also the propriety of the committee being authorized to come to Kansas in person, and visit the large numbers who might have important testimony to give touching these points. An immense expense would thus be saved, as their name is legion.

It is said that the direct use of money in procuring votes can be established in many instances; that there are many men who saw money paid, and who are willing to swear so it; that there are others who were made the mediums through whom the business was carried on, who are ready to purge themselves as far as they can of this contempt by making a clean breast of it; that there are others who received pledges in writing for various public positions, some of which were redeemed and som dishonored; that some received promises to pay in the familiar shape of promissory notes indorsed by another political prostitute, some of which were paid, and some protested; and that the Senator himself has freely admitted to many, and even been inconsiderate enough to commit the admission to writing—the paternity of which his faithful friend Ben Butler, would find it difficult to disprove—that he used money most lavishly in that most infamous Senatorial election.

Whether these things can be proved or not, we are not now disposed to discuss; but if half can be proved that it is confidently asserted can be by those who ought to know, the investigation will open up a chapter in political commerce which will make some people open their eyes and the Senator close his, politically, in a long repose. If these things are so, they ought to be known; and they ought to be known in time to prevent a repetition of them. No State can expect to be decently represented, no nation can expect to live, that allows the highest places of its trust to be thus degraded and defiled. It must be that there is enough moral consoience left in the people to prevent the recurrence of a similar disgrace; and whatever the effect of the investigation may be upon the Senator's position in the Senate, it will at least have the effect of preventing the repetition of the shameful ignominy at Topeka.

The other charge is, if possible more serious and damning than this. It is that he has made merchandise of his position; that he has sold votes for gain; that he has impeded important legislation for his State until his personal greed was satisfied; that he has grown immensely rich at the expense of the people; that he has converted the high place of an American Senator into a dirty trading house of ill-gotten gains. It is alleged that it can be proved, in support of this allegation, that he has surrounded himself with tools who have remorselessly bled individuals, corporations, and associations of all descriptions which have sought Senatorial aid in their various enterprises; and that scarcely a treaty has been made or bill passed without leaving a monument to the memory of his infamy in the shape of a personal subsidy.

It is a humiliating thing for the people of this gallent and faithful State to have to dwell upon such a humiliation as such an investigation would involve. But, humiliating as it is, the general verdict is, that it cannot come too soon or be prosecuted too severely. The public mind is thoroughly aroused with the unpleasant consciousness that it has been imposed upon, deceived, and treacherously treated. It demands the fullest investigation of the charges so freely made and generally believed. If they are not sustained, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that justice, though she slumbers long, will overtake the guilty, and that the prostitution of public position to selfish, unworthy and dishonest uses, must come to an end.
