NAGGING.

There are many bright, charming people who, when anyone has ridden roughly over their sensibilities, will sit and nag. Do they, I wonder realize just how disagreeable they make themselves when they do so?

There are many times when thebest of us feel our patience wearing thin at something or other, or friend or neighbor or relative has said or done something to annoy us. We all know the feeling which, indeed, is not one to boast of, for it is anything but a charitable one.

Many people with admirable self-control, weather these trying moments beautifully and come forth unruffled and unflustered. Some lose their temper, and still others nag.

Far be it from us to advise anyone to give the reins to their temper, and yet we cannot help feeling it would be for better for the person concerned to indulge in a quick little squirt of anger and have done with the matter, whatever it may be, than to sit and nag. There is nothing quite as disagreeable to endure, quite as uncomfortable as nagging.

The person who is afflicted with this failing and who makes himself or hesself a horrible affliction for others, may be displeased because on going to some entertainment a trolley car was chosen to convey the party instead of a train, which would have been preferred, or the party chose a musical comedy instead of a vaudeville.

Instead of making the most of the trifling disappointments and behaving like well-bred people, all through the evening they nag. We know of no trait that is quite as unpleasant, or which can more effectually spoil an evenings pleasure.

A practical demonstration of this was had at the theatre the other evening. Two young ladies came in with a young man, just before the curtain ran up. The young man took the seat next the writer. One of the girls sat down next to him; then come a vacant seat and the third of the party occupied the fourth seat. I paid no particular attention to this arrangement until the curtain went down after the first act, when a young man, politely offering his excuses, signified his desire to pass. The young man seated next to me jumped up and took the vacant seat, and the new comer took the seat he occupied. Without wishing to do any eavesdropping, we could not help hearing what followed. Do you think the young lady offered to tell the late-comer what had happened on the stage in the act he had missed? Or that she expressed sympathy at his being deprived of part of the evenings entertainment? She did nothing of the kind; but all through that intermission she nagged at him for being late. He offered her his apologies, and told her he had been detained at his office. On and on she nagged,—not loudly, not vulgarly, but with a quiet persistence which I could see made her companion very miserable. Finally the curtain went up again and the second act came on. At the close of that the nagging was resumed. That girl nagged for a good half an hour. It would be a good plan for people to time themselves when they feel like expending breath that way.

Nagging is the incipient stage of scolding, and every wellbred person ought to have a horror of becoming that monstrosity—a scold. Our Puritan forefathers treated the scolds of their day rather badly, by ducking them into the river, and, frankly, we never blamed them for their excess in that direction—very few people,—not all of the feminine sex either—are entirely free from this obnoxious habit. If they only knew what nuisances they make of themselves, they would, we are sure, religously guard against it.

The Pocketbook and the Groceries

Buying the Editor.

Every man in every town during a course of a life time has to ask a favor of an editor, remarks the Eaton (Col.) Herald. A man may escape a doctor, keep clear of the court, but once in a life time he has to have a certain piece put in the newspaper—a marriage notice or a death notice, or a notice to have his name omitted from a certain item. It is, therefore, advantageous to treat the editor fairly. Do not think you are immune; your time will come and it will be a fine investment if you have a friend in the editor. He will respect your feelings; he will help you when you are in trouble.

The above editorial calls forth the following from Roy Ray, editor of the Poudre Valley at New Windsor, Col.—

But don't imagine you have bough the editor's friendship and his editorial influence by a subscription to his paper. Only a few will sell these things so cheap. Of course you can stand in a little better with him than the man who is too stingy to take a local paper, but makes excuse that he is not interested in local affairs or that it is beneath his dignity to read a local newspaper—yet to your certain knowledge borrows the sheet and reads it at the expense of a good paying subscriber.

Yes, you will stand a little better chance with the editor. But don't imagine that he is going to land you through the pearly gates and into the bosom of St. Peter when the roll is called up yonder if you have not been just to your fellow men here on earth. Do not get the notion that he is going to do much lying for you shrivelled soul if you have sacrificed all manhood, all principle, and all friendships upon the altar of Mammon. If you have skinned your friends in every transaction,, perjured yourself to consummate the deal,, swindled the widow and orphan in your greed for gold or trodden over other people's rights to gain prestige and power, trailed your pathway with lies and broken promises to acquire political power,corrupted courts and legislative bodies of municipalities and higher degree by unholy intrigues, if you have mistreated your wife and family—don't suppose for a moment that the editor is going into ecstacies over you.

You may think that the grave swallows up all imperfections, but it does not. Men may be polite enough to say nothing ill of you, but all who knew you know what the others are thinking and how they feel deep down in their hearts

And you are not fooling the editor a little bit. He knows your thoughts and motives—and a measly old subscription isn't buying him off.

Perhaps he is too polite to say anything now—partly out of respect for your unmitigated gall in presuming to be your friend and to send you our request for the welfare of your family.
