wired for Doctor Esmond's wedding. Her cheeks were a trifle flushed as she entered, attended by her elder brother, the well-filled rooms, and she was congratulated on every side by her friends on her healthful appearance.

'Oh, Laura, darling, I am so glad you come. I was fearful you would not. Come in my room, only a second, while the doctor and I are waiting for the minister.'

'May I?' 'Thank you. I assure you I am pleased to be here.' Her voice was steady and quiet, and she turned carelessly toward the sofa.

'Than I am mistaken. Oh, Laura, Laura, I thought--I dreamed so fondly that we might, this auspicious day, renew our vows!'

'Frederick Esmond, how dare you speak such language to me, when your bride awaits your coming? How dare you address such words to me, and she to whom you have said the self same utterances will be your wife in so short a time.'

'Darling, darling, you have labored under a sad mistake. I am not engaged to May; it is Phil, my brother. Laura little Laura, look up, speak to me; tell me you love me again!'
