Our German people are beginning to think over matters for themselves.

The armistice today in Russia, Germany has been extended enough for the Germans to get all of their eastern army to the western front.

That the country is safe is more than notwithstanding the report of the labor commissioner to the contrary. We need 100,000 more road mules to relieve the coming famine. We need the equivalent number to put our transportation system in condition to move freight readily. We need an army of farmers to till the soil. We need to increase our stock of food and fuel, more by increased production than by cutting down use.

We need the repeal of the law debarring laborers who cannot read and write from our country.

The idle laborers in the cities are idle for the want of laborers in the coal mines.

The Senate has passed a bill setting clocks ahead an hour, claiming it would save a million tons of coal a year. Why could not the factories open an hour earlier by the clock as it is? The clocks do not regulate the sun or the weather.

Six thousand men are thrown out of work in Buffalo on account of shortage of coal.

The Germans say the war results depend upon the submarine. Others say they depend upon aircraft. Still others say the wheatless day will win, and now coal comes forward with its claim of supremacy. But the principles set forth in the President's message will win in the end. The whole world begins to recognize him as the leader in democratic thought and the man of the hour.

The opening of the canal to barges will do much toward solving the freight question.

George Case, of Jasper, was in our city Wednesday.

About a week ago a farmer was seen hauling a sled-load of coal away from town to his home several miles out in the country. Yet he had abundant fuel-woods on his farm and the city folks needed the coal but had no available substitute for it.

Now is the time to provide for summer's ice supply. Even if it is to be pond-nearly gathered from tanks, filled with rain water, it will freeze soon. The cakes should be little larger at first than at the bottom, so that when hot water is poured on the outside of them the block will slip out easily. For packing the double walls of an ice house, sawdust, chaff, or straw are satisfactory. The house should have good drainage and should be painted white, including the roof.

THE FORUM

DEMCORACY AND LEADERSHIP

By Rev. V. L. Eggleston

We note a tendency in some quarters to criticize that portion of the House of Representatives and of the Senate who are loyally supporting the President in the conduct of the war, as being deficient in initiative and lacking in independence. The best answer to such criticism is to point to the ridiculous spectacle which some Senators are making of themselves in their opposition to the President.

A great many people have rather crude ideas of leadership among democratic peoples. Some even dislike politics because the men chosen to represent the people are regarded as being required to serve as mere echoes of their constituents and compelled to suppress their own views. Thus they are supposed to play an insincere part in public life with a consequent loss of self-respect and of influence with the really independent element in society. Sometimes the same feeling prevails toward those who are regarded as leaders in religious and denominational life. They are regarded as lacking in courage and independence, and as being mere conformists who trim their sails to the winds of popular opinion without regard to the merits of the issues which may arise from time to time.

Now we do not question the justice of the charge that some leaders in both the political and religious sphere are lacking in independence and courage. There are occasions when this is only too manifest. Any man who is so timid that he never has an opinion of his own is unfit for leadership anywhere. At the same time the man who pursues a radical course in the opposite direction is in danger of doing as much harm of another kind. In becoming a leader a man does not become a dictator and ought not to attempt to become a revolutionist. If he feels that the situation calls for revolution and his moral sense impels him to break radically with the existing order he ought to say so frankly and become a free lance. He may or may not succeed in gathering a following for his radical views. This will depend on his own personality and force of character and upon the appeal which his opinions make to his contemporaries. But neither the timid time-server nor the revolutionist is a leader in the ordinary sense of the word. The time-server is usually discarded as a burden to the cause after a time, and the revolutionist usually starts a new movement or else wrecks himself and his cause.

The true leader, however, plays a different role. He is one with his people. He thinks and acts sympathetically with them. He is not a mere echo of their voice. He is not simply a rubber-stamp which they use to impress their views on questions of legislation or programs of action. And yet he does not break away from them and despise or disregard their point of view. In true leadership there is always a common platform on which leader and people stand in great fundamentals. Without this common platform leadership is out of the question. At the same time the true leader seeks to lead the thoughts of his constituents out into higher and better things. Men are placed in positions of leadership because they are supposed to be capable of moving ahead of the people in great emergencies and in planning for the future. In times of great excitement, a congressman or senator or governor feels that he ought to have the vision and courage to do this. Perhaps one of the chief ends of democracy is defeated. There are indeed times when the suppression of individual opinion or preference is the high mark of true leadership. Our Congress now represents such an occasion. The crisis thru which we are passing is a national crisis demanding unified policy. The President is the logical and indeed the only leader in whom such a policy can find expression. Loyalty to the people at home and to the nation at large requires that representatives and senators give their ungrudging support to President Wilson. It is the very height of folly to attempt to convert the halls of national legislation into debating societies when the need of the country is for unity of action and co-operative effort at all points.

The true nature of democracy therefore may be understood if we define its relations to the autocrat, the demagogue and the leader. The autocrat destroys democracy.

Wherever one man imposes his will as supreme on others, whether as ruler or political boss, democracy dies. The two are incompatible. They are completely antagonistic ideas. The demagogue is a parasite of democracy, an illegitimate product. When the demagogue rules democracy stagnates. No progress is possible except in so far as the people themselves are making progress. The demagogue flatters and stifles. He praises and paralyzes. He wins popularity at the cost of influence. He may become a negligible factor in becoming a popular idol. A man may be admired and ignored. All depends on why he is admired. He may be thoroly liked personally but never regarded as dependable in an emergency. The leader is the best fruit of democracy. A religious or political democracy of the right kind does not demand nor expect its leaders to be opinionless nonentities. Nor does it expect to be dragooned or browbeaten into views it repudiates. Willy-illy, a leader must wait if his ideas are true and necessary and yet rejected by his people. He will, in time, either convince them he is right or be convinced that he is wrong. Both processes will have free play. We do well to grasp clearly the nature of the conditions under which we labor and the supreme value of vision, co-operation and efficiency under leadership which can wisely lead.

Sign Boards on the Up-road

By Hamilton B. Williams

We are apt to cherish the impression that the ordinary community is deadly prosy and that the level of the thoughts of men and women is very commonplace. Not is a great misapprehension. Every little mile-square of town is the theatre of the emotional drama of all history.

In every community there are those who battle against the bonds of idolatry and obedient get them to the hill country. There are those who might sit soft in the place of ease but following their dreams go to desert and mountain that they may be swept by the glory. For principle there are those who must be deemed mad. Because they hear the Voice many are looked upon as beside themselves and the stake of public opinion is their reward.

Valjean is not the only one who battles in the solitude of the heart in order to keep his soul alive. King Lear is not the only one who faces the winter's blast of children's ingratitude, "how sharper than a serpent's tooth." Shylock is not alone in his junger-thirst for blood and vengeance.

Tragedy walks under every star. Heroism is manifest on every street.

The sounds of the songs of love in every town woven together would be the lift of a mighty sea.

The hearts in whom Light rends an air warm lighten a stand against all evil, enough thousand darker lanes than those I travel.

There is enough fortitude, enough courage to draw a God who had turned His hardened face against the world.

There is in every human heart so much of goodness that it is not possible to think the world visit the world save as a Friend.

The evils we behold trail back to those who shut the gate against God.

The clamor of the world in the individual hunger-cry, in social antagonisms, in international horrors of hate is the clamor for brotherhood.

Resolve the noises of the street, the market place, the battlefields into language—and the words would be a desperate cry to God for mercy!

No need is so apparent in this world as the releasing of that of which God and all souls are made. Love is the fulfilling.

Whenever life has wrong expressions sorrow, misery, darkness spring up of the sowing.

Whenever life seeks exit along some trail of God, in love, peace, joy, goodness, gentleness, faithfulness, self-mastery, the way is made straight for the multitudes.

Straight toward God.

Straight toward men.

One may not walk a path of light and fail to find himself, his neighbor and God.

A recent writer interprets a phrase of Jesus, "the fields are already white for harvest," in this fashion: It is as if Jesus said: "There are reluctant hearts who keep closed doors, stop their ears, blind their eyes, crush all human instincts, but there are people who wrong some conception of God, that is, say a conception of God by the cruel ritual of human sacrifice and the contrast shall bring the warning soul to the joy and life. There are people who, as Jesus in effect, who go wrong for want of affection, who live hope because the word of cheer and encouragement is too long delayed, who lose faith, because their dreams are derided. The couriers of God (let the people harken who sang with the stars over Bethlehem in their announcement of the reason why a child was coming from God's heart to a mother's, song of Peace and Goodwill. It will always be glorifying to God and our souls to sing this song.

Hate and ill-will these are hell. The couriers of God are those who bring glad tidings to the hearts ready and ripe for the harvest.

It requires the nourishing of warm hearts and the sweet rain of compassion and the rallying of the sunlight to bring to fruition in the seeds of life which He in every heart.

The world needs nothing except human beings, playing the part of life in the spirit of Jesus Christ. He is the quickening power who shall lift the world!

In the kingdom of the flesh are souls. If God be the Lord of the temple He will send out His couriers of Faith, Hope, Love in many forms and guises. We shall, under His guidance, be His ministers. Where darkness is shall light come. Where sorrow broods shall comfort kneel. Where despair is shall be heard the flute of courage. Where evil is good shall overcome it. Where desert hearts thirst and perish affection shall make a garden. Wherever a human soul needs that which is of God—His courier shall minister.

Above the darkness lie the trail-ways of light. My comrade my gate is piled rich with the goods of your caravans.

If your favorite store uses, in this issue, more advertising space than in any issue for months it probably means that it had more important news for you than in months.
