HEALTH FOR ALL

ALLERGIES

Allergy, or sensitivity to various substances, is not a new ailment that suddenly struck for the first time during this generation. But the fact that allergy is responsible for a number of conditions which were formerly unexplained has been known to medical science only for the past few years.

The person who is allergic reacts peculiarly to contact with a certain substance or agent that is harmless to most people. The allergic person is usually normal and healthy in all other respects.

When the offending agent affects the skin of an allergy patient, it causes a rash similar to eczema. Another common allergic reaction is hay fever, a condition resulting when the eyes and nose of the sufferer are sensitive to ragweed pollen or pollen of other plants.

An allergic person whose bronchial tubes are affected by some agent, causing difficulty in breathing, is said to have asthma.

We still have a lot to learn about allergies, but progress is constantly being made toward relieving and even curing allergic patients. When he seeks medical treatment, the person with allergic reactions will find that the doctor questions him thoroughly about his habits, his occupations, his home life, environment, diet and other living habits.

Before he can specifically advise or treat his allergic patient, the doctor must act as a detective and a complete history of the patient furnishes him with clues in finding the offending agents and substances.

Then the doctor can advise his patient in avoiding things to which the sufferer is sensitive, and, in some cases, the doctor can even treat his patient so that he will build up resistance to the substances bothering him.

In his search for the offending agents, the doctor may also use skin tests on his allergic patients. Among the most common substances causing sensitivity are milk, eggs, fish, alcoholic beverages, spices, plant pollens, house dust, animal hairs or dandruff, tobacco, insecticides and drugs.

An allergy in itself is not a serious illness. But things like hay fever and asthma, when neglected, can interfere with sound health as well as cause great discomfort. The person who suspects he has an allergy takes a wise step when he consults his doctor for relief.

Dry, Well-Lighted Barn Curbs Cattle Ringworm

Keep cattle quarters bright and dry to stop ringworm from causing trouble in the cold months ahead, the American Veterinary Medical Association advises.

If ringworm caused trouble in the herd last year, it is likely to be back in force this winter unless bad housing conditions are corrected now, because the fungus that causes it may linger around for as long as 18 months in a dark, damp place.

Among corrective measures are spraying barns and pens with a good disinfectant, such as a lime-sulfur solution, followed by whitewashing of walls and provision of electric lights if there is not enough natural light. All of these things should be done before animals are housed for the winter.
