From the Atlantic Monthly. CAPTAIN BEN'S CHOICE.

An old red house on a rocky shore with a fisherman's line bobbing on the waves and two white sails flapping far away over the water. Above the line, a blue sky, below the line, a blue sea.

"It is our duty to have a pleasant dinner," said David, sitting with a sigh, and Mrs. Davis also wiped her eyes on her apron. She was a woman with a simple face, but her eyes were full of a sad, steady light.

"I tell you," she said, "I have had a hard time of it. My husband is buried away in the army, and my son is in the South. Neither of them is likely to come home."

"Then she sighed again. Twice this time. "And so," she continued, taking out a handkerchief, "I am left alone in the world. Alone, I say, for I have no children, and I have no money. I have got to get on somehow."

"Mrs. Davis took a pinch of her nose and shook her head, looking at the thought that was the darkest look of all.

"Well, everybody has to have their troubles," said Mrs. Davis, "but yours are the worst. You have no children, and you have no money. I have got to get on somehow."

"You are a good woman," said Mrs. Davis, "but you are a poor woman. You have no children, and you have no money. I have got to get on somehow."

"I have no children, and I have no money," said Mrs. Davis, "but I have a good heart. I have got to get on somehow."

"I have a good heart," said Mrs. Davis, "but I have no children, and I have no money. I have got to get on somehow."

"I have no children, and I have no money," said Mrs. Davis, "but I have a good heart. I have got to get on somehow."

"I have a good heart," said Mrs. Davis, "but I have no children, and I have no money. I have got to get on somehow."

on as though all they'd got to do was to throw down their hands and let a woman do, to matter who she should be. It was enough for me. I was very careful not to commit myself. I was very glad I did not. He smiled as he reflected on his pitifulness. He was, however, so contented with his lot, that he would not have been surprised if he had found a new and not, such a master as to save.

"I have no children, and I have no money," said Mrs. Davis, "but I have a good heart. I have got to get on somehow."
