Mother and Daughter Banquet Was Successful

Seventh Annual Event Attended by About 140. Fine Menu and Good Program Enjoyed.

The King's Daughters of the Presbyterian church held their seventh annual Mothers and Daughters banquet Tuesday evening at the church parlors. About 140 were present.

Reverence and honor was the keynote of the tribute given to the mothers and daughters of the community, and displayed the comradeship which existed.

After the delicious dinner which was very efficiently served at tables beautifully decorated with spring flowers, a pleasing program was presented in a very charming manner. Miss Catherine Killigrew of the Andover High School faculty acted as toastmistress.

At each cover was a miniature figure of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" as favors.

The guests had an unusual opportunity to hear both Mrs. L. H. Kerns and Mrs. Lillian Sutton speaking on Guatamala and China, both having had personal experience for several years among the mothers and daughters of those countries. Their graphic description of the conditions and lives of mothers and daughters in these countries brought vividly to the minds of their listeners the advantages of the people of America only.

The following program was very entertaining and well rendered:

Prayer ..... Mrs. E. J. Cory
Instrumental ..... Patricia Ann Sackett, Mrs. Frank Holmes
Welcome ..... Patricia Ann Sackett
Introduction of Toastmistress, Mrs. Frank Holmes
Toastmistress, Miss Catherine Killigrew
Toast to the Mothers, Miss Marion Swarts

Children of China, Mrs. Lillian Sutton
Vocal solo, "Oh Time, Take Me Back" ..... Miss Evelyn Lloyd

Report Recommends Extension of Central School Districts

This Tells You Why the Inactivity in the Proposed Andover Centralization School System.

Extension of the central rural school system to the whole State outside of cities was recommended in a report of the Regents' Inquiry into the character and cost of public education in the State of New York, made public March 1st.

Entitled, "A Home Rule Method of Improving School District Organization," the report points out the present inequalities in educational opportunities between city and country schools and proposes a democratic method of ending this discrimination. This is to be accomplished by the creation, by law, of a temporary state commission of five which will work with the aid of an expert staff and which will appoint eight regional school district committees, one in each of the noncity judicial districts, with representatives of each county.

These regional committees, according to the proposal, will prepare the initial plans for the new central districts, showing the general program of education for the area, the location of schools, the existing and estimated population, the length of transportation routes and the estimated building requirements. The state commission will examine these plans to make certain that they fit together properly and form a comprehensive scheme for the state as a whole. The new district boundaries will be fixed by the Commissioner of Education, as under the present law, with final appeal to the Board of Regents. The report concludes:

The organization of the new districts will be created by the calling of a district meeting and the election of a board of education under the existing central rural school act. It should be noted also that this act, the provisions of which will govern the new districts established, continues in operation of all the schools brought together in the centralized district until the voters of the original district vote to close the school. This is a further guarantee that no "little red school house" will be abolished by the program here recommended, until those who live around that school vote to close their school and have their children go to the central school.

In view of the fact that preliminary maps of the school district boundaries for the entire State have been brought together by the Inquiry it is believed that the state commission with the aid of the regional committees can complete the work in a period of two years. The whole procedure of changing over from the small districts to the new larger districts, after they have been laid out by the regional redistricting committees and the state commission, will follow the existing law for the creation of central rural school districts. This law has been in operation for over 20 years and is known to be thoroly workable. In this way the State of New York can bring to all of the children of the State, wherever they live, and at a reasonable cost, an equal educational opportunity. There is nothing which now stands in the way of this equal opportunity so much as the outmoded small-district system.

Sketching the history of school district organization from 1812 to the present, the report points out that two facts stand out clearly:

First, the whole State has come to feel that the old district system, the satisfactory as a means of providing for common schools in the early days of the State, is not satisfactory now to operate high schools or to operate elementary schools under modern conditions.

Second, the "central school" system as it has been worked out in over 200 places within the State is a satisfactory method of modernizing and improving the school district system for New York State.

New York State now has more than 8,000 school districts, the report explains, many of which are very small. There are 2,075 elementary districts with fewer than ten children; 2,804 districts with 10 to 20 children; and 290 high schools with fewer than 100 pupils.

"Grotesque" district boundaries, a "crazy quilt" of centralization, "an extraordinary crazy maze of transportation," the report declares, show that the "result is confusing and extravagant" and "not in the interest of the education of the children."

Discussing the benefits of larger school districts, the report maintains that the experience of the State during the 20 years of operation of central rural schools demonstrates that the children, the teachers, the taxpayers and the whole State, the community as a whole, the school board and other school officials, the district superintendent and the State Education Department benefit.

Outlining the elements of a good school district, the report states that every school district should:

1. Contain enough children so that a well-balanced, elementary and high school program can be maintained economically.

2. Be so arranged geographically that schools may be conveniently located and transportation, where necessary, easily arranged without requiring long routes.

3. Contain sufficient assessed valuation and taxpaying capacity to carry the bulk of the school program.

4. Coincide as far as possible with the natural community boundaries and where possible, with local government units so that co-operative services may be arranged, particularly in connection with health, traffic control, planning, recreation, the joint use of plant, and proper management of the public debt.

5. Keep the schools and the government of the schools close to the people so that the citizens generally, including the parents and the taxpayers, may know what their schools are doing, may have an effective voice in the school program, and may participate in the community use of the school building.

The statement of these objectives makes it clear (the report continues) that it will not be possible, in the State of New York, to construct school districts, all of which can fulfill satisfactorily all of these requirements. For example, in areas where population is very sparse, it will not be possible to organize districts which have enough children without making unduly long transportation routes necessary. Under these conditions, there will have to be a compromise. In some areas the effort to secure sufficient assessed valuation and children would take the schools too far away from the people. Here again, there will have to be a compromise. It should be clearly understood, however, as has already been indicated, that the centralization of districts to bring about the objectives here stated does not mean that we can or should abolish all of the small one and two-room schools in the State. This can not be done. If it were attempted, it would substantially injure the educational system. It is a well-known fact that in many districts which have already established central rural schools, individual one-room schools have been continued where this was thought desirable, particularly to avoid the transportation of young children over long routes, or the necessity of their starting too early in the morning or returning too late in the afternoon. The ideals which are here stated and which grow out of the experience of this State should, however, guide the State of New York in the revision of the district system.

A Democratic Method of Getting Better School Districts

How can the State of New York transform its outmoded system of school districts into a more satisfactory and modern system so that the children of the State may all have the benefits which are now given only to those in the larger school districts? By extending the central rural school system to the whole State, cities would, of course, be omitted and large central districts would not be affected. The plan of action for getting this result promptly which has been worked out by the Inquiry is designated to make full use of the democratic process, so that the district boundaries, when drawn, will fit local sentiments, conform to community needs, make possible effective educational administration, result in economical management, and lessen disparities in economic resources of local districts so that true equalization will be brought about.
