CHAPTER IV.
The Old Stone Mill.

Old milled Tower! Time from his wings hath stolen
Lashed into fiery all the broad Atlantic
In vain conjecture would explore, or waken
One echoing tone to tell thy mystery.

Years have rolled on since then, in strength of
Might and the storm, which falling in their
Lashed into fiery all the broad Atlantic
In vain conjecture would explore, or waken
One echoing tone to tell thy mystery.

Through them a letter was discovered, written by the man they were looking for. It was postmarked "Omaha," and the contents said that he was living on the "great plains," thirty-nine miles from Omaha, Nebraska. It did not say in what direction, but that he was hunting elk, antelope, deer, and other wild game.

The father then wrote to the Mayor of Omaha, giving him a brief history of the case, with such particulars as he had in his possession, and imploring him to assist in learning the man's whereabouts; in saving his erring daughter; and in persuading her to come home.

The Mayor of Omaha turned the matter over to a committee of that city, with instructions to use his best endeavors to find the parties. This was about six weeks ago. The marshals and his detectives having supplied themselves with descriptions of the parties; made diligent search;

At the same time, with all these sights in view, while the frost of the morning is yet in the air, there can be seen beyond the low mountain to the southeast the steam escaping from the escape pipes of a quarry (sometimes called geyser), to mingle with the clouds.

A ROMANTIC STORY.

The particulars have just been received of a remarkable series of events in the lives of two beings drawn together by the ties of a guilty, but less romantic affection, which culminated in the arrest of the interested parties in Omaha on Saturday last. The case to be fully understood must be written in full. The principal characters are an English merchant, aged about 35 (who is married and is the father of three children), and a young lady, about seventeen, the daughter of a prominent clergyman and officer in the Established Church.

A WONDERFUL REGION.

Cor. of Deer Lodge (Montana) Northwest.

Henry Lake is over 5,000 feet above the level of the sea, or about the same altitude as Deer Lodge pass. The climate during the summer is salubrious and exhilarating, and in the winter not extraordinarily cold. Snow never falls so deep but that Mr. Sewell goes to Virginia City without experiencing inconvenience. He has had brook been warned of the intimacy between his daughter and the merchant, but the circumstances of the latter and the intelligence of his child were, as he judged, sufficient guarantees of safety.

When at last he awoke to realize the dreadful mistake he had made, he hastened to Liverpool, and thence to London, and in both cities employed detectives of the best reputation, to assist him to unravel the mystery, and, if possible, recover his child. From that day to this he has been unremitting in his search, and having plenty of means at his command, he has been able to employ the best talent of England and America in his case.

At first and for some months the field was dark enough. It was only known that his daughter was gone, and that about that time his trusted friend, the merchant, had also made a hasty sale of a part of his property and had disappeared. The detectives who were employed in New York ascertained the father that the two had eloped together, but further than that they could not go. They gave it as an opinion that the guilty party had come to New York and had proceeded west.

It is said that the father wrote to a friend of his in Nevada. By this means and through inquiries that set on foot, it was ascertained that parties answering their description had been seen in Burlington, Iowa, and that the man had been in the employ of the Burlington and Missouri Railroad. Meanwhile English detectives were at work, and the post-office there was watched.

Paris.—What is a miracle?
Boy.—Dime.
Paris.—Well, it is the sun was to hide in the middle of the night, what would you say it was?
Boy.—The moon.
Paris.—But if you was told it was the sun, what would you say it was?
Boy.—A lie.
Paris.—I don't tell you, I told you it was the sun, what would you say it was?
Boy.—That yer wasn't sober!
