THE GREAT FRESH REMEDY.

THE DUDLEY HEIRS.
BY MRS. BERTIE KENNETH.
No one would have been likely to accuse James Dudley of such a weakness of disposition. She was mild, compliant, and contented in her rocking-chair. Here in her cushioned seat, amidst from year's end to year's end, knitting soft tidies, and looking over the pages of her favorite novel for Dame Dudley was worth a hundred thousand dollars, and had a large circle of devoted friends. Whether there was any connection between the great wealth and the great beauty for Dame Dudley was worth a hundred thousand dollars, and had a large circle of devoted friends. Whether there was any connection between the great wealth and the great beauty for Dame Dudley was worth a hundred thousand dollars, and had a large circle of devoted friends.

But everybody, sooner or later, found out her little idiosyncrasy. No one ever told a ghost story in her room, or referred to modern spiritualism. If they had done so, she would have turned pale directly, while her plump fingers would fumble nervously with her knitting, and she would be stricken with silence. And henceforth the unfortunate story teller would be treated with studied coldness, and soon discover that he had lost Dame Dudley's favor forever. She had an unconquerable aversion for any one who brought a ghost subject before her. What the secret of all this no one knew, but it was a generally accepted fact.

The house and grounds were called Dudley Banks, because the former had both a succession of natural terraces, and stood high from the road, in the sweet air and sunshine, guardedly graceful elms and rose-trees, and sprang up by robins in the bushes and martins in the eaves. Thus it was an old house, and had been Dame Dudley's wedding dowry when she was married thirty-five years before. She had been a handsome, bright girl of twenty, and had met her husband in a garden. But six months after her marriage, the young husband was brought home dead, killed by a fall from his horse, and henceforth she was called, in the village of Andover, the widow Dudley. Mary Dudley was young and healthy, and grief did not kill her. A neighbor died and left an infant child; she adopted the child, and she was very glad. The infant's name was Prince; she called him, for the regal little head he bore and the flash of his dark eyes.

When Prince was nearly old enough to go to college, a distant relative of Dame Dudley's deceased husband died, leaving a little daughter. Dame Dudley was urged to take the child; she had means, and managed so well with her own little ones, that she had no objection to having a child of her own. Prince was a little beauty, and she called her, for the regal little head he bore and the flash of his dark eyes.

Prince stepped to be at home when the stage bringing the child arrived. He walked out of the gate, opened the carriage door, and found the child sitting alone, lying asleep among the cushions. Brown curls fell over the flushed, rosy cheeks, the unconscious mouth was like a smile. He lifted her carefully in his athletic young arms, marched up to his foster-mother's sitting-room, and laid the little one upon a couch without waking her.

"Jane, what do you think of this?" Prince stepped to be at home when the stage bringing the child arrived. He walked out of the gate, opened the carriage door, and found the child sitting alone, lying asleep among the cushions. Brown curls fell over the flushed, rosy cheeks, the unconscious mouth was like a smile. He lifted her carefully in his athletic young arms, marched up to his foster-mother's sitting-room, and laid the little one upon a couch without waking her.

Editorial and Political Commentary.
The following letter has been addressed to Gen. John A. Dix, the Republican nominee for Governor in this State, by Hon. Peter Cooper: Gen. John A. Dix.
Honored and Respected Friend—Allow me to express the pleasure that your nomination for the Chief Magistracy of our State has given to myself and the millions who long for a government that will look to the establishment of justice as the only means whereby the highest welfare of our State and nation can be effectually promoted.
