Pens, Ink and Paper

By Mary McAndrews

In one sense, advertising and inventive genius are merely different aspects of one great enterprise of the manufacturer. We shall dwell upon their cooperation in the task of raising the American standard of living far above the general level of the rest of the world.

Advertising has demonstrated its power to increase the demand of products. Thus lowered the cost of production. A large percentage of the American people are enjoying automobiles, labor saving devices in the home and in office and business establishments The rudiments of advertising are to create a large demand to make mass production possible. Subsequently, the popularity that makes production possible and the price economical is created by advertisnig.

Inventing and advertising automatically go hand in hand, for inventing does not make a product available—people must first learn of it.

Therefore the most important function of advertising is informing the consumer of the value of the product and demonstrating its purpose in making life more enjoyable, safer and fuller, and how it will save money, work and time.

Ultimately, in addition to making more things available to more people at lower prices, advertising provides the public with a safeguard that is not always recognized. For the manufacturer, investing sizable sums in advertising realized that the volume sales that will repay his investment can be insured only by producing an honest product that will live up to his claims.

We Wonder

A clergyman who was nailing up a straggling creeper observed a lad watching him for a long time with obvious interest.

"Well, my young friend," he said, smilingly, "are you trying to get a hint or two on gardening?"

"No," said the youth.

"Are you surprised to see me working like this?"

"No. I'm waiting to see what a parson says when he hammers his thumb."
