HEALTH FOR ALL

Whooping Cough

At one time many parents felt that certain diseases common to childhood were inevitable, faced them resignedly, and felt anxious to "get them over with" as far as their children were concerned.

But the development and use of vaccines for immunization have now made some of these illnesses unnecessary. Moreover, most people realize today that exposing very young children to these diseases may "help get them over with," but may also endanger the health and life of the child. Doctors feel that the longer in a child's life these diseases can be postponed, the better chance he has to ward off their harmful after-effects.

"Whooping cough is a "common childhood disease" which is a special threat to very young children. It is estimated that one out of 10 babies under one year of age who develop whooping cough dies. As the child grows older, the chances of his dying from whooping cough grow less and less.

A disease easily spread from person to person, whooping cough is caused by a grem which lodges in the nose or throat and sets up infection. Its victim suffers fever, running nose, and his coughing is accompanied by the characteristic "whoops" which make his breathing difficult and which give the disease its name. Dangerous in itself, whooping cough also can leave a child vulnerable to pneumonia, pleurisy, influenza, and even pulmonary tuberculosis.

The best way to avoid whooping cough is to avoid contact with those who have it. The danger of exposing infants and small children to the disease cannot be over-emphasized.

But it is not always possible to know when someone has whooping cough, since the disease can be transmitted even before its characteristic symptoms appear. To safeguard the infant, as far as possible, from whooping cough, doctors advise that a child be vaccinated against the disease between the third and ninth month of life. If given at least three months before exposure, the vaccine for whooping cough prevents the disease in the great majority of children vaccinated. The remainder, if they do get whooping cough, get it in a much milder form than they would if they had not been vaccinated.

The early symptoms of whooping cough are often ignored or neglected since they are similar to those of a common cold. These first signs include a running nose reddening eyes, dry cough, and slight fever. The child who shows the slightest symptoms of whooping cough should be put to bed without delay and the doctor called immediately. Prompt medical care will give the child his best chance of avoiding serious complications and may even mean saving his life.

Baker's Hardware News

The Aluminum Wares Association and The U. S. Dept. of Agriculture BACK SAFETY OF ALUMINUM WARE

Because of the circulation of misinformation in Andover concerning the alleged dangers supposed to result from using Aluminum Cooking Utensils, the Aluminum Wares Association recommends that we, as aluminum dealers, should dispel any further anti-aluminum rumors in our village.

The American Medical Association, the U. S. Department of Health, the British Ministry of Health, other U. S. Government Agencies and well known authorities agree and frequently state that Aluminum Ware is completely safe for cooking.

Following is a copy of a letter recently mailed to one of our customers from the Aluminum Wares Association. We feel it is the best means of correcting any misunderstanding. The letter explains the impossibility of any illness being attributed to the use of aluminum in food preparation.

March 1, 1950

MR. X X X
Andover, New York
Dear Mr. X X X

We exceedingly regret to learn of the recent illness of your child, as called to our attention through Mr. A. R. Baker of Baker's Hardware of your city. We sincerely hope that your child has fully recovered and is now in the best of health.

We further understand that there was some misunderstanding in that you thought the illness might have been caused by the use of an aluminum covered sauce-pan in the boiling of water in connection with the preparation of food. It is only natural when a child becomes suddenly ill for the parents to consider what might be responsible for the illness and often times under the stress and excitement, it is difficult to use one's best judgment. We are writing you as somewhere along the line, you inferred perhaps on something the Doctor in attendance said, that the aluminum sauce-pan might have been even the partial cause of the illness.

Therefore, under separate cover, we are sending you several pieces of literature which we believe you will find not only very interesting but containing sufficient authoritative data and information to conclusively prove to your own satisfaction that aluminum cooking utensils are perfectly safe to use, and are in no way contributory to illnesses of any description.

Any of the references quoted in the aforesaid literature may be written to for confirmation or further unbiased opinion. It is our pleasure to be able to assure you that there is no authentic information that in any way indicates the possibility of illness being incurred through the use of aluminum cooking utensils.

We are quite confident that if you again discuss the matter with the physician in attendance, that he will be only too pleased to assist in clarifying any misunderstanding that might still exist in the matter, as the American Medical Association of which he no doubt is a member, has definitely put itself on record on several occasions that aluminum cooking utensils are perfectly safe to use in the preparation of foods.

At your convenience you might let us hear from you, particularly in case there may be any additional information or literature that you might desire to have. It will be our pleasure to further serve you in that connection.

Yours very truly,
SJS, Secretary.

Ninety per cent of the homes in America use Aluminum Cooking Utensils. The volume of Aluminum Cooking Utensils has increased 200% to 300% since the end of the last war. Aluminum Cooking Utensils are used extensively by the Army, the Navy, Hospitals, Restaurants and Institutions. According to announcements by our Government in Washington, D. C., the state of the health of the citizens is the best in the history of the country.
