A STORY OF MYSTERY AND WONDER.

He suspected that it was written by the mysterious mythe, and he did not doubt his ability to read it. The book was as follows:

It flashed across Pennington's mind of a mind that perhaps may have made a mistake in the column of the book. He seized the volume and verified his suspicion. The innocently translated this innocent mystery into the words, "Dear Mary, I love you and always will. Pennington Smythe, and he handed his father's doubt and uncertainty to the old man, who gave a sigh and then to the unfortunate Pennington a lesson which he might remember. So when the young man made his usual "Evening call" he was waiting in the parlor by the deceased father and his grief-stricken son, and he addressed the following stern and cruel words to the young man:

Pennington sank into his chair uttering a groan. He called himself all the choice names that old Morris had applied to him, together with a selection of other epithets. He was angry at the end of that time he had formed a resolution which he proceeded to put into immediate execution.
