Farewell.
The post-boys' daily drive is over and we have had a very pleasant one. The roads are in excellent repair, and the horses are well fed and well taken care of. The drivers are all well, and the passengers are all well. The drive is a very pleasant one, and we have had a very good time. The weather is very fine, and the scenery is very beautiful. We have had a very good time, and we are all well. The drive is a very pleasant one, and we have had a very good time. The weather is very fine, and the scenery is very beautiful. Miscellaneous.

Elms and Filartations.
"That I am afraid she is a great flirt," "Yes, but not half as bad as he is." These two remarks I could not help but notice on the day in the "Row" and a very strong drive came over me to politely correct the authors—two nice fellows, gentlemen, persons and ask them if they were kindly ever met with a "flirt" of the word "flirt." I do not believe that there is any word in the English language which has a less distinct meaning, and conveys such different impressions to different minds. You may meet a lively and amusing young lady, and find that her conversational powers, not vastly intellectual, are at all events quick and, in a certain sense, clever; and when you see her in the whole of your dinner, and are not willing to renew the conversation when you meet in the drawing room; or when you see her in a party, to whom, perhaps, you are principally indebted for having spent a very pleasant evening, has been carried to your house, and how very agreeable she is!

You-Not with Ladies?
Mrs. Propper—Well, you see, there are certain men whom you would call "disparagingly" ladies; men, and so I suppose there are ladies who are—who are—
You—(savagely determining not to help her out)—Who are what?
Mrs. Propper—Don't you understand? Well—women at home in men's society, in women's.
You—Ah! And is that the meaning of the word "lady," which I heard just now applied to your friend, Mrs. Threestars?
Mrs. Propper—Perhaps it is.
You—Then we must ought to feel deeply indebted to Mrs. Threestars for her preference, and I sincerely hope that you are a Mrs. Propper.
You say this with an innocent look and a good laugh, and Mrs. Propper, so far from regarding you as an impudent young man, is evidently much pleased with you. You begin to talk to you, voluntarily having hitherto somewhat disregarded you; and you are quite satisfied that, as far as you understand the word, Mrs. Propper is quite as worthy the name of "lady" as you are. You go on, endeavoring by an exhaustive process of experimental inquiries to find out the difference of the species. It may be said that the only person who has ever succeeded in accurately describing a list of Mr. Emmsy in his poem "Lady Clara Vere de Vere." But then she was a list of a truly "portentous" type; her position was put on a considerable pedestal, and it is quite possible that "young Laurence" at his throat gasped as much out of disappointment as not becoming lord and master of the "palms and towers," as being put with a "mean street" and therefore not quite satisfied that it was the flirtation alone that induced the mingled youth to put an end to what, under more favorable circumstances, might have been a useful career. And so the moral of the tale is left in obscurity, or at least is doubtful. For if "young Laurence" sought for a wife for his wealth, we cannot but feel that the "silly young man" who took upon himself to rebuke her ladyship so thoughtlessly indulged in undervalued simple wisdom, might not have been a more successful suitor. In the clearing away the nebulous that surrounds the nature of the flirt.

To Make Long Friends.
No friendship can exist long when the reckoning is not brief. Payment of the debt of ingratitude is made by a young man who has just returned from a pleasant kind of school, and with just that usual surplus which refuses change. Optical Delusions in Colorado.

A correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal, writing from Colorado, comments on the following:
"This white" Colorado is still its wonderful effect upon "amalgamated," and every now and then is discovered the same way. It was only the other day that W. H. Clifton, the Vice President of the First National Bank of Denver, related to your correspondent for the fact the following illustrative incident.

An adventurous Englishman last season came over from his bed in Denver for a morning walk over to the mountains. As he was about leaving his boots he met two casual acquaintances, full-blown Dentures, who had just arrived to live in his hotel, and afterwards at the Breakfast for breakfast. The Denver sports gave each other the wink and said, "Congratulations." At the end of about the second mile the Englishman, at the request of the Englishmen, left the road and afterwards at the Breakfast for breakfast. The English Language.

I notice one striking change in Egypt says, "The English language is the one of the most beautiful in the world." The English language is the one of the most beautiful in the world. The English language is the one of the most beautiful in the world. The English language is the one of the most beautiful in the world.
