AROUND OUR SCHOOL

By Anita Nichols

"How beautiful the school looks," remarked both students and teachers as they entered the school on Tuesday morning.

When I heard these remarks I began to look around too, so that I also could see new things around the school.

In the Home Economics room the walls are painted aqua, and on the windows were new grey drapes.

I soon discovered that all the other second floor rooms had also been painted in a variety of beautiful colors. Each room was tinted a different color.

I noted also that the front pillars, and the black metal works had also been painted during the summer months.

In the kitchen the cafeteria workers were delighted with the new automatic dishwashing machine.

Two new thirty-one passenger Ford school buses with Carpenter bodies will soon be delivered to the school.

Lime and fertilizer has been put on the play ground to preserve it through the wear and tear from the childrens' feet.

YOUR MANNERS ARE SHOWING

Did you know that:

If you haven't seen a boy for about three months and you do not know if he remembers you and you're wondering whether or not to speak, you should. A girl is supposed to speak first to a boy, particularly when the acquaintance is casual.

When a girl's date shows up in sports clothes and no tie, and she's all dressed up for a date, there is little she can do but, perhaps, dispense with hat and gloves. It's a good idea to find out before-hand what kind of date it is to be, and ask your date how you should dress, if you are in doubt.

If a boy you've heard about but never met, calls up for a date, the proper thing to do would be to refuse. The boy should get some kind of introduction to you before he asks, or the date should be arranged by a mutual friend.

When everybody in the party is drinking the girl should refuse a drink by simply saying, "no thank you." She doesn't need to apologize.

TIME TO LEAVE

Eunice Hall

Many people have often been confronted with problems about the correct time and in what manner to make an exit from parties at homes of their friends. I think and hope the following suggestions may help some who would like to know the correct way.

We all know the kind of people who say good-bye and stand a half hour in the door still talking and repeating it.

For married couples it takes a higher technique and should be arranged before as to a sign between them, when one is ready to leave. Then at the party the wife should approach her husband's group, after they notice her, she tells her husband that they must go. A secret to it is fast-timing, if not she'll be there for another half hour.

When you have to leave before the others, tell your hostess when you arrive, not as you're leaving. If it's a large party tell your hostess good-bye and the people near you.

Approved suggestion for just when to leave certain parties are: two hours and a half at a dinner party, about two and a half hours for an after-dinner party, for a luncheon between thirty and forty minutes after dessert, and not more than an hour for an afternoon call.

You will be more relaxed when you have decided the right time to leave. All you need to do is glance at your watch, say a pleasant and brief farewell, put one foot in front of the other until you are outside.

THE ATHLETIC INSURANCE PROGRAM

The athletic protection plan is the method by which the students of many schools, like our own, are protected in case of injury in sports.

In the 1948-49 year this plan gave greater service than ever before in that it protected 44,335 individuals and paid out 4,240 claims.

The most important regulation of the plan is the 20-day injury notification and the 90-day time limit for competion of claims. It must be impressed upon the students that they must report all injuries to the coach in order to benefit from this plan.

The Athletic Protection Plan has been inproving every year benefitting more and more schools. All students from grade 7 to grade 12 in New York State high schools would be wise to seek the protection of this plan.

Nature Hints Severe Winter

One of the last things to appear from the pen of Prof. J. A. Cope, Cornell extension forester who died recently, was a semi-prediction of a cold winter ahead.

"If there is any truth in the old saying, 'Abundant wild fruit and seed means a subsequent severe winter', then we are really in for a record-breaker in 1950-51.

"In all my years of traveling over the highways and byways of this great Empire State, never have I seen such fruitfulness in forest hedgerow and plantation."

Professor Cope noted such a profusion of the winged seeds of maple that stout maple limbs were actually bending under the unaccustomed load. This was also true with basswood, white ash, and black cherry. In cemeteries, door yards, and in windbreaks about farmsteads, he said, the giant cones of Norway spruce are to bee seen hanging in clusters from branch tips high overhead. The squirrels have already discovered them and are losing no time in cutting down the cones to eat the succulent seeds.

This abundance is not confined to just the good crop species, he wrote. Weed trees, such as ironwood and blue beech, are also bearing plently of seed, and should receive the attention of woodlot owners.

Better Health For Children

A Community Service Issued by Children's Hospital of Buffalo, N. Y.

Falls that cause sprains and broken bones are not uncommon accidents with children. Fortunately, children's bodies are developing large amounts of calcium for bone growth, and their broken bones heal comparatively fast, and usually without permanent injury.

The real danger comes from improper care of a broken bone. If the break is not properly splinted and treated from the time it occurs, it can handicap or cripple a child for the remainder of his life.

Children are particularly subject to three types of fractures. The first type is called a "greenstick" fracture which means the bone is bent and splintered a little. The second type is a loosening or breaking off of the growing end of a bone. This happens most frequently with wrist bones. The third type, of course, is a severe fracture in which the bone actually breaks in two. Severe breaks may be simple or compound fractures. A compound fracture is one in which the bone breaks through the skin.

A broken bone doesn't, in many cases, look broken. However, there is always considerable swelling and pain, and a black and blue spot will appear after a few hours. Only a doctor can distinguish btween a broken bone and a severe sprain, and in many cases he needs an X-ray to confirm his diagnosis.

If a child falls and complains of continuing pain for more than a few minutes, have your doctor check for the possibility of a broken bone or sprain. If you can't get a doctor immediately, keep the child quiet where he is. If he has to be moved, splint the suspected fracture before moving him.

A splint must extend a considerable distance beyond the suspected fracture in order to do any good. For an ankle injury, splint the leg from beyond the foot to the knee. For a fracture in the lower leg, the splint should extend from the toes to the hip. For a break in the thigh, use a splint that will extend from the foot to the armpit. Splint a broken wrist from the finger-tips to the elbow, and splint any break in the forearm or upper arm from the finger-tips to the armpit.

You will need light-weight boards to make a suitable splint. Move the arm or leg as gently, and as little, as possible while applying the splint. Try to avoid any movement where you suspect the fracture. Tie the broken limb to the splint firmly in four to eight places depending on the length of the splint. It should always be tied securely near each end of the splint, and on either side of the fracture. Remember that it is always better to use too long a splint rather than too short a splint. Stiff cardboard, folded, makes a satisfactory temporary splint for a baby or very small child. Use bandage, strips of cloth, or handkerchiefs to tie the splint to the injured arm or leg.

DO NOT MOVE A PERSON WITH A NECK OR BACK INJURY if you suspect a fracture. If it is imperative that the injured person be moved, use a stretcher or door, and be sure to keep the back arched inward, so that it is "hollow." In case of neck injury, keep the neck straight, and the head back so the neck will curve in, if at all.

Don't take chances with home treatment and first aid for suspected sprains or fractures. Have them checked by your doctor as quickly as possible to eliminate the danger of permanent injury.

Long Distance Run

Little boy (to the bride at the wedding reception): "You don't look as tired as I thought you would."

Bride: "Don't I? Why do you think I should look tired?"

Little Boy: "Well, I heard someone say you had been running after Mr. Black for months and months."
