Make Use of your Broiler

Do you use your broiler as much as you might? The kitchen Reporter has several helpful suggestions. For instance, leftover vegetables may be heated in the bottom of the broiler pan while meat broils on the rack. Eggplant, dipped in butter and then in crumbs, is an excellent vegetable for broiling. One or two standing ribs of beef may also be broiled with potato fingers. There's no trick to the procedure: Just lay the roast in the broiler pan without the rack and place the pan so the top of the meat is about six or seven inches from the heat. Allow 15 minutes broiling time to a pound and turn the roast when half the time has elapsed. Put quarter-inch potato fingers around the meat for the last 45 minutes of cooking; brush with butter and sprinkle with salt.

If you find the oven a chore to clean after broiling, place a small amount of concentrated ammonia in a small dish, set the dish in the oven for an hour or two. Any fat burned on the oven walls can then be washed away easily with soap and water.
