Better Health For Children

A Community Service Issued by Children's Hospital of Buffalo, N. Y.

There is a good deal of difference of opinion among physicians concerning the advisability of having tonsils and adenoids removed. Doctors at the Children's Hospital do not approve of removing them "just on general principals." Many parents are under the mistaken impression that removal of tonsils reduces the possibilities of cold infections. This is not necessarily true. There are other areas equally vulnerable to infection such as nose, sinuses, larynx, bronchial tubes and lungs.

Advisability of removing tonsils is best determined by the condition and past physical history of the child. The general health of children who have one cold after another that result in abscessed ears, tonsilities, swollen neck glands or other complications, is usually benefited by the operation. Children who have to breathe through their mouth because enlarged tonsils and adenoids block air passages, are also generally helped. Your family doctor is best able to advise you.

Although in most cases tonsilectomies are not serious operations, they are classified as major operations because the patient must be completely anesthetized. Customarily children stay in the hospital only 24 hours following the operation, by which time bleeding has stopped and the effects of the anesthetic have entirely worn off. They should, however, be kept quiet and allowed extra rest for several days after they return home because any operation is a shock to the system. During epidemics or the prevalence of contagious disease or if the child is in poor health, the operation should be delayed. Tonsilectomies should be performed only in well equipped hospitals by qualified physicians.
