HEALTH FOR ALL

Rheumatic Fever

Though heart diseases constitute the leading cause of death in this country, there had been a drop in the number of deaths from heart ailments among children and young adults in the past few years.

One reason for this is the fact that heart diseases in childhood and youth usually can be traced to serious infections over which we have gained increasing control. Many of the infectious diseases of childhood which can weaken the heart, such as diphtheria, pneumonia, streptococcus infections, and whooping cough, are today either successfully prevented through immunization or checked with serum and drug treatments before they have a chance to effect the heart.

There has also been a reduction in recent years in the number of heart ailments caused by one or more attacks of rheumatic fever, the infectious disease still is responsible for many childhood and teenage deaths, esecially in the age group from 5 to 19.

Rheumatic fever may occur at any age, but it strikes most often among children of elementary school age. The exact cause of rheumatic fever is unknown, but we do know that an attack of tonsillitis, scarlet fever, or streptococcal sore throat often precedes an attack of rheumatic fever.

One of the characteristic symptoms of rheumatic fever is pain in the arms and legs or muscles, pains of the type parents sometimes dismiss as "growing pains." Other signs include loss of appetite, loss of weight, constant fatigue, and sometimes repeated nosebleeds. If any of these symptoms appear, especially after a child has recovered from a streptococcal infection, he should be put to bed and the doctor called at once.

If the symptoms should prove to be those of rheumatic fever, prompt medical care is necessary to ward off permanent injury. The doctor will also advise measures to prevent succeeding attacks of rheumatic fever, since the disease has a tendency to recur, and each repeated attack does additional damage to the heart.

The care of the child during convalescence is as important as treatment during the acute stage of the disease. The child recovering from rheumatic fever must have complete rest as long as the doctor thinks it advisable, and well-balanced and nutritious meals to rebuild his strength.

Parents of such a child should keep in regular touch with the doctor and follow his advice to the letter. While the doctor will advise that extra attention be given the child's diet, play, and protection against infectious diseases, he will also warn against treating the child as a "heart invalid" all his life. For under the doctor's care, the child can lead a normal, active life.

Don't Fall for "Furnace Racket"

A bulletin from the Better Business Institute issues a warning on a new "Furnace Racket." The bulletin says:

When a doorbell ringer (1) wants to "inspect" your furnace; (2) sign you up for a cleaning job at about $15; (3) then sign you up for a recementing or "gas-proofing" job at perhaps $30-$40 more; (4) insist on dismantling your furnace and then tells you it is so "dangerous" or "shot" that you need a new one —don't be hurried into a contract for something you may not need!

Investigations have disclosed repeated instances of sales or attempted sales of high-priced new furnaces where new furnaces were not needed.

Such high pressure selling has been so flagrant that all householders who may be thus solicited to buy a new furnace—or a fan, costing several hundred dollars, for the old one—are urged to have their heating equipment double-checked by someone who is experienced and qualified BEFORE signing on the dotted line.

Better Health For Children

A Community Service Issued by Children's Hospital of Buffalo, N. Y.

Each year burns and scalds claim the lives of hundreds of children. Most of these deaths could be avoided by better home supervision. To help reduce burn injuries, the Children's Hospital of Buffalo, which constantly treats severely burned children, discusses some frequent causes of burns and what to do for them.

According to severity, burns are classified by degree. Reddened skin is called 1st degree; raw spots and blisters, 2nd degree; deep, extensive burns are 3rd degree.

Among the ways in which children get burned are:- toughing hot objects; spilling containers of hot liquids; playing with electrical appliances and cords; playing with cap-pistols, firecrackers and explosives; fooling with matches, inflammable materials and chemicals; being immersed in hot water; having clothing catch fire by contact with open heaters.

The greatest dangers from severe burns are shock and infection. In cases of severe burn, call your doctor and get your child to a hospital. First aid treatment for minor burns is to apply vaseline or boric ointment on the burn and cover it closely with a clean bandage. Butter may be used instead of the ointment. Or, you may saturate clean gauze pads with baking soda solution, which is made by adding a teaspoonful of baking soda to a cup of water, and place them over the burn. Hold the pads in place with a snug, clean bandage and keep them wet with soda solution. Burns which cause blisters should be seen by a doctor because infection easily starts with a broken blister. Never puncture a blister — it's nature's protection. Tannic acid is no longer considered good for burns and iodine or similar antiseptics should never be applied.

Dont's fool with sunburn! Even a mild sunburn is a 1st degree burn and injures the skin. Babies and young children have thin skin, so they burn more easily than adults. For this reason they should be protected by shade-hats, shirts, and overalls if they are at the beach or exposed to the sun for long periods. It is not necessary to have sunshine to get burned. Severe sunburn may be suffered on misty, foggy days. Suntan lotions offer some protection, but mineral oil and baby oil should never be used — they increase burning.

Both children and adults can become actively ill from too much sun. Anyone suffering chills, fever, or nausea should see a doctor. Sunburn may be relieved by applications of cold cream or vaseline but burned areas should not be exposed to the sun again until all redness has disappeared. Play safe; guard against sunburn.

Seems as if some people grow with responsibility—other just swell.

Arithmetic

Teacher—"Yes, Willie, you had your hand up; what is it?"

Willie—"Why is it you can't subtract apples from peaches or oranges, but you can add them and make fruit salad?"

Two in One

Tim—"So you think this girl you're going to marry is thrifty?"

Tom—"Well, what do you think? Before she eats a marshmallow she always uses it to powder her nose."
