Wire and Nails Can Cut Milk Flow in State

New York's veterinarians realize that wire and nails aren't worth much as scrap metal, but if kept away from cows they can mean increased production for national defense.

The vets figure that about 14,000 of the nearly million-and a-half dairy cows in the state will die or go out of production from eating small pieces of scrap metal. Losses are estimated at about $3 million a year to the dairymen, says Dr. John McAuliff of Cortland, president of the State Veterinary Medical Society.

Dr. S. J. Roberts of Cornell states that the college's ambulatory clinic treats about 160 cases each year from the territory around Ithaca, or about one every other day. One nearby dairymen estimates his losses at twice the one per cent rate figured by veterinarians.

Nails and small pieces of wire are listed as the chief offenders. A veterinary professor says he always looks for the number of cases on a farm to be doubled for three years after a new barn is built or an old one remodeled.

The scrap metal can be removed only by surgery. A method developed at Cornell during the 1920's is used by a number of veterinarians, one of whom says, "the cow can almost tell you she has something picking into the wall of her stomach. The operation is done in the stable with the cow standing. When the metal is removed, she sometimes begins chewing her cud even before the stomach is closed." This doctor uses a magnet to remove the pieces.

"The moral, according to the vets, is to pick up all wire and nails and other scrap around the farm so the cows won't be killed or injured."

Better Health For Children

A Community Service Issued by Children's Hospital of Buffalo, N. Y.

The exact cause of rheumatic fever is unknown. However, certain facts about this chronic disease have been established which the Children's Hospital of Buffalo reviews for parents in this area.

It is generally believed that, although rheumatic fever is not in itself contagious, some families seem to be more susceptible to it than others; that poor housing conditions increase its occurrence; that it is seldom found in children of pre-school age. Aching joints, constant fever, pallor, loss of weight, frequent nosebleeds and poor diet may be indications of rheumatic fever, but may just as well be signs of some other illness.

Many physicians believe that there is a connection between streptococus infection and rheumatic fever because it is almost always preceded by a "strep" infection. So far there isn't any known way to avoid rheumatic fever but the family doctor should always be called if there is fever, undue fatigue or aching in the joints. The earlier this disease is diagnosed, the better the chances of good recovery. The doctor may make some blood tests and examine the heart by fluoroscope or electrocardiograph because rheumatic fever inflames the valves, muscles and outer lining of the heart. This may not mean permanent injury but an attack of rheumatic fever always requires special care after recovery to avoid such heart damage.

Parents should try not to "baby" a child who has recovered from an attack so that he regards himself as an invaled. He should be allowed as much exercise as prescribed by the doctor. Parents can, help to protect him against another attack by following a few simple precautions:

1. Have the child routinely examined by the doctor even though he feels well.
2. Keep him away from people who have colds or sore throats.
3. Try to avoid fatigue and chilling.
4. If the child catches cold, keep him at home indoors until he has completely recovered.
5. At the first sign of fever or pain, call your doctor.

The only effective treatment for an acute attack of rheumatic fever is long rest in bed under good medical and nursing supervision. It is extremely important to follow the physician's advice in this regard.

Muskrat Marshes Prove Popular

One of the newer conservation measures being established in Allegany County is the muskrat marsh to make use of the idle swampy areas in pasture of cropland where farm income was formerly not available. The Directors of the Soil Conservation District have reported that the interest in the new muskrat marsh program has grown by leaps and bounds with serval muskrat marshes already built in the county.

Muskrat marshes usually differ from farm ponds in that the water is about 2 foot in depth over the entire area with just a small area in back of the dam having deeper water to support fish. A farm pond usually has at least a third of the area with water over 8 foot in depth and none of the water under 3 foot in depth.

It usually takes about a year for the muskrats to move into newly constructed marsh areas after which some trapping may take place. At about the end of 3 years, good trapping is usually available. For a properly constructed muskrat marsh the annual harvest should be about 10 rats per surface area.

The New York State Conservation Department is cooperating with farmers in Allegany County who are Soil Conservation District members by making available through the district financial assistance toward the construction of a muskrat marsh. The payments are not to exceed one-half the total cost and at the rate of $50.00 for first area and $25.00 for each surface area of muskrat marsh thereafter with a total limit of $250.00.

Since muskrat marshes utilize formerly idle acres it is recommended by the Directors of the Soil Conservation District that every farmer having land of this type give serious consideration to developing it so cash crops will result.
