Superintendent Draper urges school officers, teachers, friends of education and pupils to observe Arbor day, May 6. In 1891, 8,956 school districts celebrated the day and 25,786 trees were planted.

In his address to the school children Superintendent Draper offers this suggestion: "The Connecticut Grange has begun an interesting work in preserving records of noted and historic state trees. Let us see if we can not do something in this way to perpetuate the histories of our grand old trees. Look out for the oldest, largest and most picturesque trees in your district. Measure the circumference of these trees, find out all you can relating to them, and then sit down and send me the story by mail. No doubt many of the facts you give would be of general interest, and some of them may be printed in the Arbor day circular for 1893."
