Chances of Death in War. .

No doubt every reader has seen the streement that it takes a man's weight of lead to kill him. The statement is usually looked upon as a rhetorical hyperbole, suggested by the fact that comparatively few out of the whole number of shots fired in battle take effect. Marshal Sale, we believe, first made the statement that forms the basis of the above; only he said that it "would take 125 pounds of lead and thirty-three pounds of powds."

The bound of lead and thirty-three pounds of powds. "The would and visionary as this may seem it appears that there was really more truth than poetry in the remark. remark.

At the battle of Solferino, according to M. C. ssendi's carefully deduced calculations, a comparison of the number of shots fired on the Austrian side with the number of killed and wounded on the part of the enemy, shows that 700 bullets were expeuded for every man wounded and 4,200 for each man killed. The average weight of the ball used was thirty gr. ins, therefore it must have taken at least 12 kilograms or 237 pounds of lead for every man put out of the way. Yet Solferino was a most bloody and important eny agement. At the battle of Solferino, according to
