TSI ANN AS A REFORMER. In September, 1898, the Empress Dowager, in the name of the conservatism of China, dethroned and imprisoned her nephew, the Emperor, because he had fallen under the influence of the reformers. She denounced all the innovations he had sought to introduce, and those of his 🚉 friends that she did not capture and execute were driven into exile. But though she came into power to restore the old she has remained in power by conceding to the new. In less than three years she had substantially adopted her nephew's programme and has now gone beyond it. | By the edict of August 29, 1901, it was ordered, to the amazement of the literati, that the essays of candidates for degrees should not be on ! some moot point of purely Chinese scholarship, relating to a remote past, but on such modern topics as

SYNOPSIS.

ACT I .-- Scene: Kitchen in the Tompkins farm house. Sewing carpet rags. Mother, John and I are engaged. Weil, you can disengage yourself. for you'll never be married. Enter Jerry. Mrs. Clark, she's took worse. Mrs. Tompkins goes over to see Mrs. Clark. We'll have our party in spite of Aunt Sarah. Well, who makes the cake? It's a great scheme, Dixey. Does you think as how it's quite honest? Dixey tells the story of his life. The song. Jerry comes after the herbs. Hey! Howdy! Oh, these rags! My cake! I hain't a worritin'! My chores is did. Jerry helps himself to doughnuts. I'd like to help yeh if I could, ca'se I put my own little gal where I can't do nothing for her. Louise talls Dixev her trouble. That mother of your'n is a powerful schemer, an' no mistake. John starts for the city. A tender farewell. He has gone, but I shall see him again. Oh, I am so happy! The quartet.

ACT II.—Scene: The farm house kitchen, as in Act I. That carpet weaver steals rags. Dixey helps Louise cut the meat. A pouring rain. If this weather lasts a week I shall be stark, staring crazy. Jerry brings the mail. A letter from Papa. Louise faints. Child! child! what is it? The forged letter. Do you mean to say she was shamming? I have more respect for a drunkard or a murderer than I have for a deceitful person. When you can prove that Louise is such a person let me know, and she leaves this house at once. Julia finds a certain document of great interest to herself. I am entitled to my father's love, and Louise is an outcast. Mother, if I become John Remington's wife within a year, your secret is safe. My God! my God! I almost wish I were dead. Ruth receives an urgent letter from her father. I've got to do it, Dixey. Pray for me. Dixey, you're a nice, comfortable, fallen angel in disguise. Dixey helps Ruth set the table. Dinner is ready. I swan, I guess I set this table with a pitchfork. Don't you think you are a little hard on her dady, dear? Your mother just ruined that girl. Ruth starts for the city. It looks zif they'd got to be a change here purty darn'd quick, an' zif I'm the fellow 'lected to bring it about. Mrs. Tompkins, I'm an honest man. hain't no rascal. John Remington's hand is the price of her silence. I'm dead sot on them two propositions. You claimed to be an honest man; now, what can you do about it? I'm dead sot on them two propositions.

ACT III .- Scene: The farm house kitchen, as in Act II. Dixey oversleeps. I ought teh ben up half an hour ago. The telegram. If John's all right, bring him back with you. Dixev starts breakfast for the women folks. Mr. Tompkins feeds the stock. The marriage contract is drawn up. don't think it is quite proper for a girl to be alone with a man before she is married to him. I'll be your shappyrone, lambkin. A private conversation. Ruth and John arrive from the city unexpected. My darling, it was all a wicked lic. The battle is on; there won't be no breakfast eaten in this house to-day. It means that Louise is my promised wife. John Remington, how dare you? A miserable, dirty little waif, picked up on the streets. I'd be a poor sort o'man to get inteh a wrangle with that crazy critter. My wife, your attitude tells a story that breaks my heart. Louise is my own little girl. Dixey is discovered to be a millionaire. Ruth and Dixey patch up a misunderstanding. Friend Tompkins, a third man has taken our little girl, an' we can all be happy in spite of them two sentimental kids. God bless you both! May your remaining years be very happy. Reparation and joy. Curtain.
