GERALDINE FARRAR

In "Maria Rosa," a production of Supreme Merit, Saturday Evening

Having seen Geraldine Farrar in all her great roles, both on the singing and on the silent stage, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that in the part of Maria Rosa she has reached her greatest histrionic triumph. "Maria Rosa" provides wonderful opportunities for an artist of the first class. A great and abiding love, great simplicity coupled with great cunning are the chief characteristics of the part. Miss Farrar makes the conjunction of these elements in a woman's heart seem overwhelmingly probable because she makes them overwhelmingly real. She does become merged in the character she is asked to portray and the audience is therefore treated to the rarest of pleasures—seeing a sublime part in the hands of a highly gifted artist who realizes the utmost expectations of the dramatist.

The tragic points in the film are developed with unsurpassed skill, making the happy ending all the more pleasing. Atmosphere and lighting effects are upto the highest Lasky standards, but I cannot conclude without saying something for the added charms of novelty and variety in this feature. Old Spain has never been depicted with more charm and sympathetic understanding, whether on stage screen or canvas. The support of Miss Farrar was good, but she rises high above the rest of the cast.—(From review in "Motion Picture World.")
