The Governor has refused to say whether he will do but steal."

"But do you wish the Government to protect you?" asked the judge. Dugan winced.

"Your honor," he said at last, respectfully, "I used to think any kind of government was tyranny and that I ought to be allowed to do whatever I pleased. But I never meant that other people should be allowed to do what they pleased to me. I didn't work the thing out that far."

"And what do you wish the court to do for you now?"

Dugan's face twitched.

"If you'd send me to prison, judge," he said at last, "they'd feed and clothe me, and I'd have some rights under the law. That would be a lot better than what I've been thru. I'd at least have some kind of standing with some other men, even though they were only convicts. There may be a lot of tyranny in the government or, at least, in some governments, but there's no tyranny so bad as absence of government."

"Then we'll give you another chance," said the judge.

So Dugan was restored to the protection of law and released under a suspended sentence. The judge was satisfied that he had been cured.
