yet in order to put all of our acreage remaining into barley.

Barley is more profitable than oats. In fact, very few farmers make any money out of oats under the best circumstances and very few barley farmers ever lose money on barley. There is always the fascination of getting a fancy price for fancy barley, and although less than one per cent of all grains are used for malting purposes, the additional price which it gives to barley over oats always makes money for the farmers. While perhaps one per cent of the grain crop is used in brewing, the loss of feed value is much smaller because fully one half goes back to dairy farmers in the form of dried grains and other by-products, which for feed purposes is among the best available.

"Regarding the best yields of barley, we will say that this is rather a difficult thing to give because the yield sometimes depends more upon the threshing record. However, the yield sometimes depends more upon the threshing record. However, the yield so pied of pedigreed barley of members of the Wisconsin Experiment Association was in 1913, 31 bushels, 1914, 32.3 bushels, 1915, 37.5 bushels. The yield for 1915 is the average from over 260 members reporting. Some of the highest ones are as follows: 60, 67, 56, 55, 53 and 45 bushels. "It is impossible to state what has been the highest one say relads of the been the highest which will be the yields for last year, which was a vera good barlay season, are guite reasonable, but one though that there may be larger yields than these, but I have no knowledge of them."—J. BARLEY NOT A HUMAN FOOD

As a Bread Cereal It is Little He As An Animal Food It is of Great Value

[kattest Great Value.]

For many centuries barley, the "corn" of holy writ, was used as a bread cereal, but it has practically gone out of use, except that Norway and Sweden use it in their peculiar bread disks, which are about the size and shape of a phonograph record.

Barley in itself does not make a a good bread flour and could be utilised only by mixing it with wheat, something which the American miller considers desceration of his shrine. It has a peculiar flavor and is just as different from wheat bread, as either
