

The Lot That Has No Railing

There is in a certain city a lot which it is said has an iron gate, with a large gate and lock, but with no railing around it. The mere magnitude of a building affords to a depositor no more protection than the locked gate without a railing protects that lot from vandals. The strength of a bank is not in brick or stone, but in the character of the men who direct its affairs.

Wholly irrespective of the size of their accounts, we welcome the business of men and women who seek a conservative bank.
