WOMEN IN THE WAR WORK

Washington, D. C., March 29.— Secretary Helen Ross Robinson, of Colorado, is contributing some notable articles to the Pictorial Review pointing out the reasons of the Government in utilizing the full value of women's work in the war. Mrs. Robinson, who qualifies as a first-class statesman, a virile writer, and a model housekeeper, emphasizes her belief that the Food Administration should have more women to tell women how to cook. She propounds the unanswerable question: "If you desired advice on housekeeping would you go to a bunch of lawyers or would you go to those who had oodles of experience on the subject?" The reasoning process is carried further, and it is argued that "if there is one thing under heaven that women do know something about, it's housekeeping; it has been their one job for centuries; struggling to stretch $10 to do the work of $15 has been women's 'privilege' since the first home was built."

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, Chairman of the Woman's Committee Council of National Defense, deprecates the tendency among women to get up new kinds of societies and organizations, and she asks for the co-ordination of all women's activities. "Every able-bodied woman should either be engaged in some useful work today or preparing to fill the place of some man who will be called in the next roll of the 'selective draft'."

Women like Mrs. Robinson and Mrs. Shaw clearly point out that their sex is not holding back, but on the contrary the women are anxious to do more than their full share of war work. Women, are however, appealing for the opportunity for broader and more general service in the affairs of the war.

The Survey of Women

Millions of women have been registered for war duty. Particularly effective work in this respect has been done in South Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Washington and other Western states, where the difficulties in enrolling the women have been hard to overcome. As a result of the registration a very clear analysis of community needs, and the ability of the local women to look after those needs, has resulted. One State Chairman, in summing up the questionnaires, says: "Every item of the information here asked for is something every community ought to know about itself in time of peace." Another statement quoted in the official publication, says that "if these surveys accomplish only the end of quickening our sense of duty toward the home population, for which our boys at the front are fighting, they are simply worth while."

The women of the country have been as carefully classified as the men in the selective draft. Every request of the Government for women's help has been instantly met. The Red Cross units have owed their big success, almost entirely to women; and women are doing their full part in the war work.

But they want to be even busier and consequently they are knocking at the door of Uncle Sam, calling out: "Give us a greater variety of things to do!"

Why Did She Leave Home?

Several years ago I stood with a prominent man watching a busy stream of people passing a busy spot in Boston, and he turned to me to ask: "How do they all make a living?" Next to that I made a living in the one we have in Washington; and as you see a flock of newly-arrived pretty girls you can hardly help asking: "Why did they leave home?" I have asked a good many of them this blunt question, and they answer, "patriotism" after which they lay it to the announcement of the moving picture magazine. Little further discussion of the matter settles the problem down to a desire to see something more than "Washington" and "I thought a hundred dollars a month would be a fine salary, and it is a good deal more than I got back home." But most of the young ladies are far from being "stuck on their job," and as for seeing how things were done they might have had a better perspective of affairs had they stuck to their posts back home, and spent the money that it has cost them to relocate, on a "pleasant trip" that would have given them a good vacation and brought them back to their homes in two or three weeks. School teachers and young ladies without office experience will need to cajole themselves a good deal to make themselves believe that their connection with a Washington department in lines of work where they draw down more salary than they earn doing things entirely unfamiliar to them, is essential in order to show their patriotism. The fact is that nine-tenths of these young ladies would do better for themselves and the country if they stayed in their own home towns, and put in their spare time knitting for the Red Cross units, or helping to boost some of the women's local war activities. And incidentally, a hundred dollars a month in one of the most expensive cities in which to live in the country, is not going to give anyone an opportunity to compete with Rockefeller as a money-maker.

Getting on a War Basis

The Nation is settling — just like coffee does after it has boiled in the pot. As coffee grounds steep their brew and then dive for the bottom as the conscious that there was no longer any reason for them to muddy up the amber fluid, so has war quit boiling over the top, and the national brew is ready to deliver its contents. Senator Reed of Missouri, has been making speeches by the yard picking the Food Administration to pieces. Reed is one of the ablest men in the Senate, and he never has believed in the principle of food control. He and those who think with him, contend that the high cost of living is largely due to the fixing of prices. And they cite plenty of instances where "regulated" prices have shot up like mercury in a thermometer when hung in the noonday sun on a hot day. The Fuel Administration certainly has "no one to love him"; but his troubles are over for a time, and if Dr. Garfield is with us another winter most people will miss their guess.

After all we have come thru the muss in pretty good shape, since actually the Government policy repealed the laws of supply and demand. But the affairs of the country have been partly readjusted, and re-established, and it is safe to say that we are on a regular war basis. Large industrial and commercial establishments that have been sailing close to the wind to find out what was going to happen, are ready to go ahead and do their business as nearly like they did in normal times. Of course a lot of institutions have frozen onto Uncle Sam as their main customer, but someone has to buy and sell goods on the outside, or the treasury will run dry. "People can get used to anything, even the hives," we have long been told, and conditions conform themselves eventually to even a war.

The Mystery of War

One of the dozen prominent men in America is the Secretary of War, and yet he walked out of one of the busiest offices in the world, and there wasn't even a "personal" in the Washington newspapers until he landed in France. Washington was as surprised as the rest of the country when it read that Mr. Baker was in Europe. The comment in the Capital was: "It's a fine thing that Baker has gone across."
