thing downstairs. And don't leave the house unless you go with me. I want your promise that you will not come downstairs. Will you give it to me?"

Tony didn't understand why she should promise this, and a whimsical thought came into her mind that she was always making promises to someone, but she couldn't refuse him, and Philip went away a little happier and feeling much more secure.

CHAPTER XI.

"I Love You Here's the Whole World!" One late afternoon Philip MacCaulley started for the Pendlehavens, desirous of seeing Tony Devon. Katherine saw him guiding his car up the roadway and ran to the door to meet him. Her smile was especially radiant for she had begun to lose her fear about Tonnie's influence over him.

"Sit down, Phil," she exclaimed. "Mother's sick today. Reggie almost sets her into fits."

Philip still remained standing.

"And you've kept away so much, dear boy," complained the girl. "It seems you don't care for us any more."

"I do, though, but I've been busy," replied Philip, not able to think of any other excuse.

"But you've always been busy, more or less," the girl shot back. "And yet you came. Mother and I have come to the conclusion that you couldn't have been very much interested in me—Cousin Paul's protegee. You haven't even asked about her."

Philip coughed embarrassedly then laughed.

"The fact is, I came to see her today," he exclaimed.

"Her mother went wax white."

"What do you want to see her for?" she asked sharply.

"Oh, just to talk to her," replied MacCaulley, awkwardly.

Katherine shook her head.

"I don't believe you can," she protested dubiously. "Cousin John won't let any of us go up to Paul's room, and she never comes down any more."

"Where's Reggie?" demanded the boy.

"Oh, he's gone to Trumansburg today," answered Katherine, listlessly. "And I am glad of it. I wish he'd never come back. He keeps mother in tears most of the time he's here."

"And Cousin John! I want to ask him if I can take Miss Devon."

Katherine's head went up in disgust.

"I know what you want to ask him," she interrupted tartly. "But you shouldn't waste your sympathy on that Devotee Girl. But mamma says—"

Before she could tell him her mother's opinion, the door opened and Dr. Pendlehaven walked in.

"Cousin John," said Philip, abruptly, going to him, "May I take Miss Devon out for a little ride? I'll promise to bring her back in an hour."

The doctor looked at the boy's dark pleading eyes, looked and then smiled.

"Perhaps you won't have any better luck than I have had, son," he answered with a little laugh. "I've almost been down on my knees to the girl, and she absolutely refuses."

"Oh, that's how the land lies, is it?"

She Stopped and Kissed Paul Pendlehaven Impulsively.

She wanted you to drive with him. Now, what do you say?"

"Say yes, darling Tony," Philip ejaculated with sparkling eyes.

"Oh, that's how the land lies, is it?"

The Man She Married

And the Perplexing Problems a Boy Found Himself Faced In Love With There

The man she married or—the man she loves! The boy to whom she was married by her dying father before she was old enough to realize the solemnity of the vows she took, or the romantic soldier of fortune who won her heart from the instant when he lifted her like a kitten in his arms and thrilled her with a kiss. To which of these two men shall she give herself?

These are the perplexing problems with which young, impulsive, beautiful Dana is brought face to face before her girlhood is ended. And the finding of the answer to them furnishes Beatrice Grimshaw with the material for her latest, greatest romance—"The Isles of Love," which will be published for the first time in the SUNDAY NEW YORK AMERICAN, beginning next Sunday.

Every lover of the best in fiction remembers the sensation created by Miss Grimshaw's "Valti of the Islands" when it appeared a few years ago in the Saturday Evening Post. Since then millions of readers have enjoyed her "Guinea Gold" and "When Red Gods Call."

Her latest story, "The Isles of Love," is a greater one than any of these. It thrills with the adventure, throbs with the warm romance for which the South Seas are famous more fascinatingly than anything else this popular author has written.

If you like adventure that keeps your interest on edge—if you enjoy a captivating love story—if you want to see the secrets of a woman's heart revealed as they never have been before—don't miss the opening chapters of "The Isles of Love" in NEXT SUNDAY'S NEW YORK AMERICAN.

The story will be illustrated with a full page in color, and a delightful series of black-and-white pictures by Edmund Frederick. Order your pictures by Edmund Frederick. Order of your newsdealer in advance to be sure of not missing "The Isles of Love."
