ENGINEER IS A LUCKY CHAP

Falls From Moving Train But Threw Himself Out of Way of the Wheels as Train Passes

James Gilbert, an Allegany division engineer living at Hornell, had a marvelous escape from death early yesterday morning when he fell from a moving train just west of Olean and went down between the cars. He was only slightly hurt and was brought home.
 Gilbert was running an east-bound fast freight and just before reaching Olean he left the throttle to climb back to the tank to ascertain, if he had water enough to run into Cuba, where most fast freights take water. In going over the tender he slipped on a piece of coal and lost his balance, pitching from the moving train into the darkness. He threw himself forward and cleared the rails, plunging down the embankment along the tracks. He was dazed for a moment but got to his feet and swung aboard the caboose of the train as it passed.
 In the meantime C. A. Averill, the fireman, had missed the engineer and brought the train to a stop within a quarter of a mile. Engineer Gilbert climbed back to the cab and resumed the trip. At Cuba junction he was suffering so greatly from the effects of his sudden jolt that he had to be relieved from duty. Another engineer was sent from Salamanca to bring the train into Hornell and Gilbert was placed aboard passenger train No. 4 and brought home.
 His injuries are not serious but his escape was a remarkable one.
