You Can Prevent

Most Chick Losses

The too frequent heavy death rate among chicks during the critical breeding period is one of the heaviest drains on poultry profits. Baby chicks are expensive—every one that dies is a real loss that can't be made up. It's better to raise the chicks you have than to replace them with others. There is no reason why you should not grow to maturity practically every good chick you hatch or buy. The secret lies in the feeding from the first meal the original baby food for baby chicks.

Pratt's Buttermilk Baby Chick Food

It completely nourishes the chicks, resulting in quick, even, healthy that and development; casries them safely over the dangerous first weeks. Chicks eat so little during the first six weeks that the texts cost of the perfect chick food, the original "Pratts", is next that it is made up many times by the value of the extra walue of every chick raised.
