

The farmer needs money to purchase implements to till his crop, planting lines or to help him hold his crop for better prices. If he has a bank account and keeps a reasonable average balance on deposit, his credit is established and the banker is able to negotiate a loan for him. When he harvests and sells his crop he does not want to take a risk of loss, so he promptly brings his checks and cash to the bank. Then, if he meets his obligations and manages well, almost every recurring cycle of the seasons finds him in more prosperous and pleasant circumstances.

We thank our farmer friends for past favors and hope to be of more service in the future
