MISS FREDERICK'S LATEST STARRING VEHICLE
 Atmosphere in "Roads of Destiny" New Goldwyn Production Correct to the Last Detail

A real old fashioned barn dance with real old-fashioned music furnished by a mouth organ, concertina and fiddler is one of the opening scenes in "Roads of Destiny," a big new Goldwyn picture starring Pauline Frederick which comes to the Auditorium Wednesday, June 8th.
 The story is one of that famous author's, O. Henry, adapted for the screen by Channing Pollock. Miss Frederick herself is very enthusiastic about "Roads of Destiny" and believes she has found a big theme which is bound to make an impressive photo-play and one that will not be easily forgotten. She makes her first appearance in a modest little street costume sauntering along into the midst of the laughing, whirling couples in the barn dance. No matter in what gown or what particular type of individual Miss Frederick may be portraying, she always adapts herself to the character's circumstances, making her role as realistic as possible. In the barn dance, she enters the throng, and laughs, jollies and enjoys herself with the crowd of extras as she were actually living in the olden days when the barn dance with the old-fashioned music and surroundings was the regular nightly amusement. The young folks arrive in a big hay rack and the lighting for the hall is furnished by oil lamps with typical glass pendants twinkling from the chains and one can imagine the sweet musical sounds as the wind catches them each time the door opens. The atmosphere in this new picture is perfect.

The costumes are of the kind that your grandmothers wore years ago. Every setting in the picture is faithful to the last detail of the country interiors and exteriors. —Advertisement
