He might have said that an the lonesomeness has already been banished, and that the remainder h rapidly disappearing.

The automobile has done it.

There is no need for the farmer o his family or his help to feel lone ome these days.

Distance no longer exists for him With his car he can be in town at any time within a few minutes. He can visit his neighbors for miles around any evening after supper while attendance at church on Sunday and social gatherings at other times require but little more effort than is consumed in walking around a city block.

His life, in many ways, is prefer able to that of the city dweller. His health is enhanced by the sunshine and the pure country air that he breathes. His life is not menaced by the constant stream of cars driven by reckless motorists as is the case in most cities. His children grow to ma turity in the purity of contact with nature, instead of being surrounded by the questionable environment of more congested centers, where there is little opportunity to sift the good from the had. He is free to go and come as he desires and is not hedged around with the myriads of restric tions and laws of the city man.

Tilling the soil is popular now. It will become more so as time goes on and the beauties and advantage of nature are better known and un derstood by those who now live by clock and the factory whistle.
