IDEAL

No walk alone have I—no hours serene,
No one insistent bears me company.
Nevertheless we walk apart far as
The East is from the West. Uproad
he treads;
The Netherlands woo me. He would be with Me tho I hail land's end—be at my side
At outmost star. My brother? No;
but like
As God and man, as man and God
unlike.
He is the Man God dreamed that I should be.
The Man (His Grace be mine) that I shall be.

Browning speaks his faith in God as a master builder whose skill and honor are challenged by the incomplete human edifice.

From the atom up to God the journey runs. We were a long time atoms, and a long time many evolutionary forms, and we're going to be forever that which God dreamed before the world leaped out of the sun.

Browning's word is this: "All I can never be, all men ignore me, this I am worth to God."

The most pitiful idea ever inventing—and brutally tragic—is the idea that we are fallen from some high estate and doomed to destruction.

We are not destructible, comrades. A modern philosopher defines religion to be loyalty to the Beloved Community of God. This is simple truth. What else could religion be? I mean religion as indicating a purpose to fall in with divine will, and to play the game according to the rules.

The honor of God will be a flaming consideration, and out of that will go battalions to overcome the evil that hinders the growth of the race.

The honor of man will be a flaming consideration, and we shall feel the thrill of godliness in our adventures in friendship.

The consciousness of being an individual in the Beloved Community on whom depends a portion of the work will work an adjustment of harmony. One shall come to feel a vast enthusiasm for God if he knows Him to be very close and giving His infinite energy to the task. One shall feel that the situation such as we find it, with a world-full of undeveloped human beings, needing light and impulse and every positive guiding, is a situation challenging one's utmost.

One's "utmost" indicates one's loyalty to the project.

In a world like this we need All of God, and all of every man.
