Rude Rural Rhymes

WIVES WANTED

When the world was new and the forest thick, when man and beast with one good lick and fanned a bit with a sharpened stick, the female picked a husky dub with health and strength to bring home grub. But later on, the ladies found, mind cut across where brawn went 'round. Then boys with bulging brows were taken because their brains left home the bacon. The old style men of beef and muscle for women were compelled to hustle. It never dawned upon those boneheads that they should cultivate their own heads. Among the birds they saw the males win brides by pretty tufts and tails. They had no wives and wished to land some; they too determined to be handsome. Those lowbrows soon had wives a plenty and had to sell off ten or twenty, and since theirs proved a winning game, each later headhunter tried the same, while all the lads too long and lanky, knock-kneed, big-eared, sway-backed and shanky, lay to their souls the pleasing unctious that they have intellects which function. The man with neither looks nor brains is out of luck among the Janes. Fair Hannah came to share my home, lured by my broad and spacious dome. My ugly mug she did not mind, but dreamed of intellect behind. She long since found she was mistaken, and though by her I'm not forsaken, my bluff no longer gets across, she knows I am at total loss, and tells me so at time, by jabs, but never lets on to the neighbors.
