Rude Rural Rhymes

THE USES OF AFFLICTION

I know a wilding apple tree which never drops its fruits until the winds of autumn days are blowing thru the shoots. Its pomes are small and sour and mean; they have no earthly use until a dozen frosty nights have sweetened up their juice. But after that I love their taste, and as I go and come I pause beneath the apple tree and feed them to my tam. The parsnips in my garden plot, they have no charm at all, if Hannah cleans and scrapes the same and serves them in the fall. But when the bitter winter cold has crept in thru the core and Hannah cooks them in the spring, I call three times for more. The sons of men, like roots and fruits, prefer the summer's favor and yet they need a harsher touch to bring them to their flavor. Fate is not blind, she knows our need of sorrows piercing thru us; the more we kick against the pain, the more she soaks it to us. Lord, make us wise to see the power that lies in all affliction to sweeten up our point of view, our actions and our diction.

—BOB ADAMS
