SELECTING THE SWINDLER

his own limitations in selecting the article, feels he can best protect the cause of the company by presumably working on a commission basis.

Later a contract is made to be signed. This contract may resemble a mining or oil stock certificate with green stock borders, the purpose of which is to impress. The terms of the contract call for the regular 5 per cent. commission in event of sale. When the inventor has signed and returned the contract he is then ready for the picking.

Shortly after the contract is returned the inventor receives a letter stating that a manufacturer is interested in the patent and a speedy sale may be expected. As an added encouragement, the letter states that the company desires to know in what bank the inventor wishes the proceeds of the sale deposited.

From now on the sale is about consummated but several exigencies seem to arise. The manufacturer wants a further search and the victim is asked to send $25 for a "prospectus" or what not, to demonstrate the patent and its utility. This starts a series of fees which the inventor is asked to pay.

The next request may be for more money to pay the construction of a model. Following that the company may want an industrial survey made. The fees charged for these various services are whatever the swindlers believe the victim will stand. This mulcting continues until the victim becomes alarmed and if he is that to cause trouble the company closes its office and departs, leaving no address. As soon as new stationery can be printed the swindlers start again under a new name at a new address.

The method by which these companies operate while they vary in small details, are substantially the same. The whole scheme is designed to deceive the inventor and the public alike.

A very large percentage of the inventions come from the rural districts where the inventors have little or no facilities for the marketing of their articles. They have no contact with manufacturers as have inventors who live in the industrial centers. It is from the rural districts which the swindlers reap their richest harvest.
