BEANS

All hail Boston, Yankee queen, the home of Harvard and the bean, who thrusts her many spires toward heaven, proud of three hills as Rome of seven. There beans are served for Sunday dinners and other meals to saints and sinners, but if you order New York style they chase you for a half a mile. My folks were not among those odd fish who worship culture and the codfish; but yet to them the law was known, they dwelt within the baked bean zone and having dined too well on Sunday were almost always blue on Monday. Of all the crops in gardens seen, I like my sires prefer the bean. Of Stringless Greenpod's plain brown seeds I plant a lot to meet my needs. It is a most prolific podder which Hannah cans for winter fodder. For early use I chance the frost; if these are nipped not much is lost, but beans are from a tropic home and much prefer a warmer loam. My good old grandsire, long of yore, gave me this bit of Indian lore. For fear bean seed would rot and spoil, they tried the warmth of spring time soil. To see if it were right for plants they sated it without their pants and if not goose-fleshed took a chance, please.

But in our times more warfare there, we try the soil warmth with our fingers.
