Advice to Campers

I'm very glad that Henry Ford is shipping flivvers free on board, that likewise, Mr. Chevrolet is turning his'n loose each day, as well as certain other gents who give us boats at small expense. I'm very glad because of that to find the proletariat, whose pocket books are darn near flat, can still go scooting here and yonder as free as any bloated bonder. I much admire in summer weather, to see the Joneses out together. They constitute a camping party, and every kid is brown and hearty. They boil their pot and warm their beans amid seductive sylvan scenes, then pitch their tents beneath the stars and leave the road to other cars, till Phoebus bids them cease to snore and rise to hit the pike once more. O brothers, leave your camping site as slick and clean as when you light. Amid your horseplay and your laughter remember those who follow after, and do not curse the haunts of Pan with cracker box and salmon can. Yes, quench your campfire that no spark, escaping from it in the dark, may scorch the scene you found so fair and leave a desolation there. I bless the honest careful tourist, alike the junkman and the jurist, but darn the man who scatters matches and spoils our nice green forest hatches.
