Sallie's Temptations

(Copyright 1924—By Gladys Baker)

"Wake up, Bright Eyes, I've brought you some flowers."

It was Anne Coddington standing with her arms full of bright pink-roses beside her bed. She looked attractive as she stood there in her little white linen frock, her eyes sparkling and her cheeks as pink as the roses she held. There was a crisp wholeness about her.

I glanced at my wrist watch. Ten o'clock! I knew it was an unearthly hour.

"I'm sorry to wake you, Sallie," Anne apologized, "but I wanted you to know that I couldn't help seeing—I've felt wretchedly about it," she stammered, "I just had to stop by to let you know I'll never breathe it to a soul—but you knew I wouldn't, anyway, didn't you, Sallie?"

I had no idea what it was all about.

"What in the world's the matter?" I inquired. "Have you just set fire to the orphan's asylum?"

Anne smiled, or rather tried to, but I knew it was more of a reprimand for my frivolity. Anne is serious minded, being one of those women with a purpose. She even has an office down town where she writes advertising and makes gobs of money. She is from one of the oldest families in the state and "be-longs" but is not very popular because she is not a good sport.

"Oh, you know what I'm talking about," Anne continued. "Last night, Sallie, don't you remember? Ted and—er—Sallie, how long have you been engaged? Wait 'til I put your flowers in water and then tell me all your plans."

She moved over toward the window and began arranging the roses in a dull blue bowl.

Then over me came a flood of memories. The dance—the music, wafted to us in the car—Ted—the evening air, soft-scented and caressing, like purple chiffon—then Ted again—the lady in the moon—the kiss—the unexpected appearance of Anne.

I laughed. Ted had said nothing about even being in love with me and here she was taking it for granted that we were engaged. Anne was a funny girl. Altho we are as different as two sides of a coin, I am closer to her than any other girl in my crowd. Maybe it is because she helped me out of so many scrapes in boarding school days. Then, too, it is only natural, I suppose, to like those who love us, and certainly Anne had proved that she was devoted to me. Why, I could not understand.

"Good night, Anne," I finally managed to say "do you think just because Ted kissed me, that I should drag him to the altar and make him promise to love, honor and obey?"

There was a pained look in Anne's eyes.

"For goodness' sake," I added, "don't look so shocked, you make me feel positively immoral, my dear." She sat silent with a puzzled frown and I noticed that tears appeared. If I had not known her so well I might have thought that she was a woman with a past. "Did you have a good time, Anne?"

"I did, in a way," she answered. "But that was one reason I came out looking for you. I thought maybe your date would take me home. I didn't want to make Gordon leave and I was having such an unhappy time. I think now I know why I am such a wall-flower at a dance," she said.

"That's silly, Anne, I comforted, "you're not." "The I had noticed that, in spite of the fact that Anne was a good dancer she was never rushed, and it was not at all unusual to see her with the same partner for several straight dances.

"Well, I found out something last night," she ignored my remark. "I was waiting with 'Goat' Jenkins. He had been drinking a lot and what do you think he said?"

Anne blushed. She was one of the few girls in the world who could. "I'll bite!" I answered. "What did he say?"

Anne's voice sank to a whisper. "You're the only girl on the floor with one of these on," he said, and meant my corset, Sallie. "Go upstairs and park 'em and you'll get more dances," he suggested.

"It's funny, Sallie; I love to dance, I feel the music to my very soul," she continued, "and yet I'm conspicuously unpopular. I noticed last night that you couldn't get two feet without three or four of the boys breaking at once, and there was one time when I counted eight breaks before you could get half way 'round. And yet you sat out three whole dances with Ted. If I were as popular as you, I certainly wouldn't spend my time outside. Sometimes I wonder—"

"Don't do it darlin', it's an awful tax on the brain," I wanted to cheer her up again.

"Well, maybe you're right, Sallie. Anyway, I must be running along." Half way across the room, she turned. "I've some publicity to do for the Lingerie Shop and guess what I've got to write for the feature ad?"

I couldn't. It was too early to even try.

"Corsets," she flung at me, and, smiling humorously, she hurried away.

The phone rang. I reached it from the taffeta skirts of the doll-lady on my bedside table. "Hello." It was Marjorie Chenoweth.

"Curtiss Wright's in town and he's the most thrilling person you've ever known. He and Bob were classmates and we were going to ask you both over tonight to dine."

"Yes, yes," I replied, "go on."

"Well, in the first place all the ambitious mothers are trying to marry him off to their debutante daughters because he's a very successful architect, but so far none have been able to hold his interest. He has been quoted as saying all sorts of scathing things about the 'jazz type'—you know, he's the cynical kind."

"Oh, Marjorie, not a woman-hater—how divine!" I was overjoyed.

"That's all right, Sallie," she warned. "I know they all fall for you, but not Curtiss Wright. I'll bet."

"What time did you say we were to dine?" I interrupted.

"That's the thrilling part, Sallie. He couldn't come. He's having dinner with your dad."

"That's great!" I announced. "This is ONE night I dine at home."

17 Per Cent For Taxes

Few people realize the extent of the total levy of local state and federal taxes upon the American Niagara power industry. It amounts to 17 per cent of the total income received by the industry.

Notwithstanding this fact, the American producers of Niagara power continue to sell electricity at the lowest average price received by any generating system on the North American Continent.

Can you think of any other American industry which pays over to the government so large a proportion of its income in taxes?
