

Sallie's Temptations

(Copyright 1924—By Gladys Baker)

CONCERNING SALLIE

Sallie is a modern, pretty young creature, with all the emotions and desires you yourself had when you were at that glorious age that lies somewhere between sixteen and twenty-five. Sallie is everywhere. The eyes of the world are upon the ultimate outcome of her moral code. Is she going to weaken her creed of right and wrong and stretch her philosophy to that of the girls who have a "good" time?

Your little girl is just where Sallie is. She must decide for herself. They are all Sallies at heart. Sallie's experience, put down truthfully from the pages of her life, may help your Sallies. Each chapter is complete in itself. Read it this week. You will enjoy it.—Editor.

In Which Sallie Is Kissed

Dr Gray assured me that father had rested well during my absence and was a little surprised at my early arrival.

"Why, it's just about the time that you usually start out for your dances," he remarked, glancing at his watch and making ready for his departure. "Your father will sleep soundly," he told me, "so go to your room and dream of sweethearts, moonlight and roses."

The night was entrancing. Christmas Eve and yet the air was balmy with the warmth and delicacy of April. There was only starlight, for the moon was a slender, insignificant rim of gold violet gauze suspended.

The shadows held unshushable music. I must go out. I could at least wander in the garden. Winding a spanish shawl, that was wholly enveloping, around my shoulders, I was soon out in the breeze-swept place with its narrow brick walks, rose trallies and myriad flowers. I do not know how long I sat on the marble bench bathing my senses in the still beauty of the starlight, when to my astonishment, Curtis Wright stood before me.

"The door was open and I felt that you were not far away, for some reason," he apologized for his sudden appearance.

"Oh, I'm GLAD you came!" I gave him welcome and moved the deep crimson fringe of my shawl so that he could sit beside me.

"You ran away early," he suggested, after a pause, "long before the others."

His words brought back the Windsor and Anne Coddinton. I did not reply and in a few moments he again broke the silence.

"Sallie, may I ask you something?" I nodded.

"Do you like Billings?"

"Ted?" I questioned, and involuntarily I shuddered and drew my shawl closer. Curtis Wright was watching.

"No; why?" I answered his question.

"Nothing," he responded. "I shouldn't have asked. It's none of my business and it would have served me right if you had reminded me of it."

"Oh," I changed the subject, "I wanted to tell you that the reason I went to-night was by Doctor Gray's orders. 'I'd rather have gone with you,' glancing up at him, "ten million times rather."

"I'm glad you explained," he continued, and his voice sounded happy. "I was peeved like a school lad when I saw you had given me the merry ha-ha and gone on out with Billings' Move silence. Then faintly waited the sound of young boys singing. "Ho-oly Night, Si-lent Night."

Th e harmony was lovely, a husky blending of youthful tones that reached one's inner being.

Mr. Wright took my hand and held it closely.

"Christmas Carols," he said softly. We sat enraptured.

"Shall we stroll?" I whispered, with the passing into the night of the singers. He signified his approval by rising quickly, and arm in arm, with the wind in our faces, we made a tour of the walks and hedges. Then we paused beside a rose tree in blossom. Tiptoeing, I pulled a deepening red bloom from one of the tall branches.

"With that in your hair, you will be a perfect Senorita," Mr. Wright suggested. Then taking the rose from my fingers he fastened it with my little barrette and stood back, in open admiration.

"You are beautiful," he announced slowly, as if some power were drawing the words from him.

"Oh, do you, do you really think so?" I was eager, starved for one word of his approval.

"How could I help it?" he responded.

Then as if by common impulse, his arms closed about me. He pushed my hair gently back from my forehead. All thought left me. I was conscious only of a drowsy sense of intoxication. His fingers cupped my chin and again and again he kissed me.
