He possessed a trait that was most commendable-finding pleasure in doing his work right. To him it was not an ordinary job, to be dealt with in a haphazard fashion, but a profession deserving of the best efforts he could put into it. More men with the same sort of ideals with respect to their jobs would make this a better and more livable world. He should be an example to the people who try to "get by" in the easiest way possible. His rewards were small in a financial way, but he himself had the satisfaction of knowing that he was doing his work well—as good as it was humanly possible for it to be done. No person could ask for a finer benediction at the end of the road on earth, than that he did his work well, regardless of what his duties might call for. There are doubtless other men who are equally as conscientious in performing their daily They are known only to their employers and their intimate friends.
